Foreign Athletes Coming To U.S. For Better Life

SEATTLE.—(P)—"The look of longing on their faces" has changed to the bright smile of hope for some 14 European displaced persons who will come to Seattle to start life anew.

Royal Brougham, sports editor of the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, announced that local sponsors had been found for the group, most of whom are athletes.

Brougham said he believed most were Latvians, "but I didn't ask their nationalities. All are displaced, all are in need. All have been screened by the proper authorities and approved as prospective citizens."

Without disclosing names, Brougham said individuals and sports organizations would act as local sponsors, helping the immigrants find homes and jobs.

"They will leave Europe as soon as possible," he said. "Many are in displaced persons camps. Valdis Teteris, a distance runner and the first one I corresponded with, works in a Belgian coal mine."

Elmars Zemgals is a chess star and the only non-athlete among the heads-of-families on the list. He hopes to resume his law studies in America.

Kazimirs Upenieks, once a Russian soldier, is a distance runner. Arvids Berkolds, Rusolfs Lejens and Alfreds Reisters are basketball players and skiers. Aleksandra Briedis, Baltic swimming star, lost her husband during the war and hopes to find a new home here for herself and small daughter.

"I got the idea as the American Olympic team was leaving England for home last summer," said Brougham. "The look of longing on the faces of Europe's displaced athletes is something no one could forget."

who was the only woman mayor of an Oregon town before the advent of Dorothy Lee in Portland, is not anxious to hold the job at Bonanza for another four years, but friends dropping around to her kitchen-office say they are going to write her name in again.

High Court O. K.'s Reforesting Law

WASHINGTON, Nov. 8.—(P)—The Supreme court yesterday upheld the power of a state to compel persons engaged in commercial logging operations to make provision for reforesting cut-over areas.

The authority of the state of Washington to enforce such a requirement was challenged by Avery Dexter, owner of 320 acres of timberland in Pend Oreille county, Wash. He appealed from a decision by the State Supreme court upholding constitutionality of the requirement.

The Supreme court in a two-line order affirmed the state court. It gave no reasons. Justice Douglas took no part.

Dexter contended the owner of timberland may do as he pleases with his property. But the state court said an unwritten compact between the dead, the living, and the unborn "requires that we leave to the unborn something more than debts and depleted natural resources."

The Washington law requires every land owner or operator to leave reserve trees in a quantity sufficient to maintain continuous forest growth, or to provide adequate restocking to insure future forest protection.

Health Welfare Demand To Be Stressed By IWA

SEATTLE.—(P)—The boommen and rafters district council has recommended that emphasis be placed on a health and welfare program, plus a "substantial" wage increase in 1950 negotiations with lumber industry.

The recommendation was submitted to the parent International Woodworkers of America (CIO), and asked that these two points be emphasized in negotiations for loggers and millworkers, as well as boommen.

The council urged that a strike be called off if "results are not shown early in negotiations."

Delegates from all IWA unions will meet in January to map 1950 contract demands.

George Willett of Portland, Ore., was re-elected as boomman and rafters representative on the IWA negotiating committee.

Edwin Thompson, Everett, was elected council president; Ellis and Les Garrison, Tacoma, secretary-treasurer.
