Students Trained In Responsibility Of Citizenship

(Ed. Note: This article, entitled "Responsible Citizenship" by Junior High Principal R. R. Brand, is the second in a series on American Education week appearing in the News-Review.)

By R. R. Brand

Junior High Principal One of the chief objectives of modern education is to provide training and experiences for the students of our schools so that they will become responsible citizens. It is not sufficient that we teach the traditional three "R's," but in addition youth must be prepared to become capable, thoughtful, efficient citizens of our country if we are going to make democracy work. Through courses in history, civics, and socio-economic problems, today's students learn the inner workings of their local state and national governments and their attempts to solve the social and economic problems of our times. By means of representative student government in our high schools they gain experiences in managing their own affairs in a democratic way. By serving appointments on committees, by participation in the activities of the school, by acting as a leader as well as following the leadership of others, students in a well organized school today are getting training and experience in a democratic way of life that should make for responsible citizenship as adults. This week is the annual "American Education Week." Visit your schools and find out first hand what is being done in your schools to train for responsible citizenship. man is asked to furnish his own shoes and gym slacks or shorts and 25 cents to defray expenses.
