Master Builder Chooses Army Career

Sgt. James R. Rhodes was holding down a high-paying job as a construction foreman when he enlisted in the Army in 1949. "I got fed up with seasonal work and frequent layoffs," says Jim. "In the Army I get security and retirement benefits I'd never match in civilian life." "I already knew my trade when I came in, but if you're inexperienced, you can learn most any skill you want in an Army school—mechanics, carpentry, radio operation, welding—just name it." Jim is enthusiastic in recommending the Army to young fellows who want to get a head start on a real career. Full information is available at every U. S. Army and U. S. Air Force Recruiting Office.
