Cultured Pearls

... A STORY OF SUCCESSFUL FLATTERY

For more than a thousand years pearls have been the constant desire of more women than any other gem.

Perhaps this is true because pearls have the quality of being most flattering to any woman's skin—especially so if the pearls are matched to her skin coloring. Today we see women wearing pearls of one kind or another so frequently that we almost fail to notice their subtle beauty.

There is a right and wrong way to choose pearls. Just as there are many shades of skin coloring, so are there many shades of pearls. Some shades of skin coloring and pearl lustre harmonize wonderfully... other combinations are discordant. This is not true so much of the imitation or simulated pearls because the beads themselves are not often matched well. But matching cultured* and genuine* pearls to the skin is very important.

For example, a brunette whose skin is olive complexioned will find that cream lustre pearls will be most flattering to her skin and hair; while blondes with light, rather transparent skin find pink or translucent lusted pearls most flattering. If possible, pearls of different lustre should be held against the skin in order to compare one with the other.

Cultured and genuine pearls properly matched become more flattering with wear because human skin seems to develop and increase the lustrous quality of these gems.

At Knudtson's you will find a selection of cultured and genuine pearl necklaces priced from 68.50 and simulated pearls from 4.50. You are invited to inspect the pearls we display and inquire about their qualities and value.

*Cultured pearls are artificially propagated by inserting a bead into the flesh of the pearl oyster and nurtured to development.

*Genuine or oriental pearls begin with a microscopic irritant in the pearl oyster which is coated layer upon layer with the gleaming substance for many years.
