U. S. Tightens Ban On Sending Data To Russia

By CHARLES MOLONY
WASHINGTON — (AP) — The government has tightened up its machinery for keeping scientific and technical data from going to Russia.
The commerce department announced that "in exceptional cases" it will impose an outright ban on export of technical information which is "significant to the national security."
The obvious object, though not stated in the official statement, is to keep such information from reaching the Soviets.
The main aim is to help a private firm withhold matter affecting national security when the firm has a contract that would be breached by refusing to make shipments.
This is the background:
Recently, the department set up a "voluntary control plan" over export of information. It asked Americans to get an opinion from it before exporting data which might have a security value.
Some firms requested advice and were given opinions against sending the data abroad. Later, they reported they would like to withhold it, but feared law suits for breach of contract.
The imposition of bans on export is intended to relieve these persons from danger of suit, since they can show the shipment was forbidden by U. S. government action.
No ban is likely to be imposed except in a case where the prospective shipper of information takes his problem to the commerce department.
Officials pointed out no complete ban could be imposed unless there was a censorship on all mail leaving the United States. They stressed there is no intention whatsoever of setting up such a censorship.
Neither the voluntary control plan nor the prospective bans in "exceptional cases" will supplant current provisions against export of technical data classified by the government as security or secret matter. Other government regulations will continue to take care of those cases.
