Redwoods Thrive In Alaska After Centuries' Lapse

PETERSBURG, Alaska. — (UP) — Redwoods are living and thriving in Alaska for the first time in 35,000,000 years.

This was made known here this week by Petersburg officials of the U. S. forest service who planted seedlings of the prehistoric Dawn Redwood near their office last July.

Throughout the summer and fall the tiny plants received all the care a loving mother could tender. They were sheltered from the weight of last winter's snows, and as those snows melted this spring, the seedlings emerged, apparently brown and lifeless.

Hope had almost been given up but someone decided to take a final look last week. He found small traces of green visible on all the seedlings and here and there definite shoots of new growth.

In prehistoric days the Dawn Redwood thrived with birch, beech, oak and chestnut trees in the then temperate forests of Alaska, Greenland, Iceland, Spitzbergen, Northern Siberia and the Arctic islands of North America.

Climatic changes, scientists say, eventually killed off the giant trees. In recent years traces were found of what were thought to be ancestors of the giant redwoods of California. Prof. Ralph W. Chaney, paleobotanist at the University of California, investigated simultaneous reports from China. In the Chinese interior he found the trees growing in a locality known as the Valley of the Tiger.

The tree and seedlings were taken back and germinated at the University of California. Sixty tiny shoots were sent to the forest serv-
