Surgeons Pare Human Hearts To Cure Maladies

LOS ANGELES.—(AP)—Surgeons at Wadsworth Veterans hospital have successfully cut away portions of the hearts of three patients, Dr. Thomas Barrett, chief of medical services, reported.

Clots were found to be forming in certain pouches of the hearts. A specially designed clamp was applied in each case. Members of the department of surgery at the University of California medical center here cut away each of the faulty pouches (auricular appendices) and stitched together the openings into the heart.

The main chambers (auricles) of the heart have appendices that help pump blood. They appear as bulges on the heart's surface, and not as a dangling tube as in the intestinal appendix. In some types of heart disease stagnant blood accumulates in the auricular appendix, clots and eventually moves into the bloodstream. If carried to vital spots, such as the brain, death results.
