

Second-Rate Militia Defend Seoul Approach

INCHON BEACHHEAD, Korea — (AP) — The North Korean communist troops armed with defense of Seoul seem to be second-rate militia strongly laced with the wild-eyed type Communists. U. S. marines are astonished by the tissue paper Red resistance met in some places. But they were equally amazed by instances of wild, suicidal bravery by individual North Korean soldiers.

More than 800 persons have been taken already and their story is continuously the same.

Some 20 percent claim they are South Koreans forcibly conscripted, given a quick training course and then sent into the line with commissar-type officers behind to keep them there.

Another 40 percent are North Koreans originally brought in as labor battalions, then rushed into Inchon when the invasion began. They broke and ran after the first shock of the crushing sea and air bombardment followed by the lightning marine landing.

Those who came in rapidly as the marines pushed ahead. The majority gave themselves up. A few were located by civilians and then flushed out by the troops.

At a forward command post, Col. Lewis (Chester) Puller of Saluda, Va., said he was amazed at the ease of the landings at Inchon.

At those had been Japanese, there would have been a line of dead marines on one side of the wall and a line of dead Japs on the other down there at Inchon," he said.

The colonel took elements of this same marine division ashore in the invasion of Peleliu.

He said "These fellows don't amount to much."

It was apparently inexperienced that led a Red tank column to complete disaster in a valley about five miles north of Inchon.

Marines gave them their own medicine. They waited until six tanks were well inside their positions and then opened up with bazookas and artillery.

All six were knocked out within a few minutes. Blackened corpses were still lying on top of the tanks and nearby, indicating the North Koreans didn't have a chance to turn the machines around and try to escape.

The oldest surviving self-propelled vehicle in America is a steam carriage built by Richard Dodge in New York about 1868.

Bar Association Head Proposes Reversing Trend

WASHINGTON — (AP) — The president of the American Bar association proposed that Congress create a commission to guide the government in reversing what he called the country's "trend toward socialization."

Harold J. Gallagher of New York, opening the ABA's annual meeting here Monday, said in a speech prepared for delivery before several thousand lawyers that the U. S. is rapidly becoming a "service state" run by "an absentee central government."

"The menace to American liberties from Soviet aggression is clearly visible," Gallagher said, but "our danger from within is more subtle, is little understood by most of our people, (and) is therefore more of a threat to our liberties."

He urged that the country's 160,000 lawyers unite in seeing that emergency government controls be quickly discarded when the need for mobilization ends, so that they "shall make no permanent inroad on our liberal institutions."

Gallagher said neither political party will challenge the movement toward concentration of power in Washington.

Lawyers therefore must take the lead, he said, in urging Congress to create a commission of "distinguished and impartial experts."

The commission should be instructed, Gallagher said, to recommend laws or constitutional amendments which would:

1. Restore local self-government by deciding which affairs can best be dealt with at the state level and returning these affairs to state control.
2. Give the states exclusive power to collect certain types of taxes, so that they may become financially independent of Washington.

3. Transfer social welfare matters to the degree possible, from the federal to local governments or to "private enterprise control."
4. Re-examine all existing laws which tend to "promote the socialization of business and to hamper individual initiative."

Earlier, Gallagher told reporters he "can see no reason" why Communists should not be required to register, but he declined to commit the ABA for or against the communist-control bill now nearing completion in Congress.
