Pay Cut For Purchasing Savings Bonds Urged

to get a program underway, he reminded.

Plain Talk Needed

Facing a meagre audience of 16 people, Minnaugh deplored the lack of interest in bond drives to day. Boys, who are dying in Korea today didn't want to be there either, he said, but it is important to us that they be there.

This kind of talk is not pleasant, he continued, but "I think its time that this kind of talk be done in every town and community in the nation."

The government has experimented in order to find out what the results of a campaign would be. Three large firms were tried with good results. They reported 68, 98 and 90.6 percent participation in the payroll savings plan, respectively.

"But this outcome was secured with the same initiative and effort that the executive would use in directing his own business. An Ohio firm got 90.6 percent participation, he said, because the boss laid the responsibility for the program on his very capable plant manager who went about it as if he were directing a plant operation. The result was an "old fashioned" campaign without pressure—but successful.

Not to be overlooked, Minnaugh averred, is the fact that this company called in the union grievance committee immediately and made it a joint endeavor.

"I rather think it can be done," Minnaugh went on. Management will do it if the logical answers are provided. Labor will cooperate—if asked. But somebody is going to have to get to work."

Many employers were indifferent to the program, Minnaugh said, because they believed that inflation would wipe out the value of the investment. "But," he countered, "the little person has no choice. He must go where his principal is guaranteed."

"Who is there to say that what has always happened will not happen again," he said. "Deflation might set in, rendering the dollar worth more and savings invaluable to the workman."
