Polio Rarer, But Epidemics Larger, Paradox Offered

CHAPEL HILL, N. C. — (AP) — Polio is becoming rarer and that may be why epidemics are larger, why more adults get it, why there is more paralysis of victims and why more of them die.

This paradoxical possibility was explained by Dr. Edward G. McGavran, dean of the school of public health, University of North Carolina. It is based on the probability that formerly almost everyone at some time suffered a mild polio attack, and that a larger and larger number of us escape and mild form today.

So many escape that polio may really be rare by comparison. The very name, infantile paralysis, Dr. McGavran said, comes from the fact that originally this disease mostly attacked infants. It was then so commonplace that possibly nearly every infant contracted it, but most of the cases were mild or unrecognized.

Polio, he said, has gone the same way as many other infant and child diseases, and is no longer so common.

The mild cases apparently conferred lifelong immunity, and nearly everyone was immunized in early life. Now, not so many of us are immune, and if that is true, Dr. McGavran says, it explains the increase among adults. There are also more older children getting polio for the same reason.

Why there should be more paralysis and more deaths, Dr. McGavran says is not certain, but this too can be explained readily if polio is like most other diseases. Each disease is likely to do more harm to some special age group than to other ages.

Dean McGavran says it may be that paralysis is worse when polio hits older ages and that polio may be more often fatal in older persons than it was in infants.

He thinks field research may stop polio before laboratories produce vaccines or other medicines. Field research is looking for the now unknown ways in which polio spreads. If the reasons are discovered, it may be possible to break the chain of transmission—which would be truly preventnig the disease.
