New Theory Gives Hope Of Curing Rheumatic Ills

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J. — (AP) — Hope is held out for ultimate discovery of ways to prevent a new cure such diseases as rheumatoid arthritis and rheumatic fever. It stemmed from announcement of a new concept of the cause of the diseases announced by four Washington researchers: Dr. Thomas McPherson Brown and three associates of George Washington university school of medicine and Mt. Alto Veterans' Administration hospital.

They reported evidence which they said suggested the possibility that the whole class of "rheumatic diseases" — probably the major cause of chronic illness in America today — may be due to an unusual type of microbe, called an "L. organism."

This concept, they declared, may alter sharply the current concept that such diseases are primarily due to a deficiency of some substance produced in the body tissue. And they said the theory offers an explanation of why the drugs ACTH and cortisone, which have shown promise in the control of certain rheumatic ill, produce temporary effect and therefore must be administered regularly.

If further research establishes that a specific germ is involved in rheumatic disease, they said, the way would then be open to possible direct attack with drugs for the prevention of a full-blown attack or the overcoming of established symptoms. Already, they reported, certain of the "antibiotic" drugs — tetracycline, aureomycin and chloromycetin — have shown promising effects. But they added that on the basis of the new concept, more effective weapons might possibly be found.

Dr. Konrad Dobriner of the Sloan-Kettering institute for cancer research, New York City, reported evidence that abnormal function of the adrenal glands is "an integral part" of rheumatoid arthritis. He offered no statement in his report as to whether he thought a microbe also was involved.
