Headaches

A headache is not a disease, but a warning indicating that something is wrong somewhere in the body. It is purely a symptom and only a thorough examination will reveal the cause. There are many kinds of headaches. Some headaches may indicate that a serious illness is in the offing, especially with fever accompanies them. Children's diseases, infantile paralysis, influenza, meningitis and other contagious diseases begin with a headache.

The ache may be located in different parts of the head, its location usually indicates the part of the body from which the headache originates. Other symptoms may confirm this reflex condition and a thorough examination will reveal abnormalities. Irregularity of function may be traced to its source and corrected. To many people, excitement or any emotional disturbance will cause a headache. Fear, worry, overwork, loss of sleep or any other condition that taxes the patient's vitality may result in a headache. In such cases the victim's reserve of vital energy is usually below par and the least deviation from the sufferer's normal life results in a headache.
