Slowing Of Bonus Applications Cuts Employees' Staff

Although fewer than half the veterans eligible for the Oregon bonus have applied, applications are being filed at the rate of only about 700 a day and the department of veterans' affairs has commenced reducing the size of its bonus staff, Director William F. Gaarenstroom reported.

By Nov. 16, in seven weeks of operation, 47,196 veterans or their next of kin had applied for the bonus payment. At one time there was a backlog of some 20,000 applications awaiting processing, but the department has reduced this to a current figure and veterans who apply now may expect an acknowledgment card within ten days.

Several bonus employees have been laid off due to the lag in applications, believed due to the fact that no money is presently available to make payments.

This fact, however, makes it possible for the department to check applications more thoroughly, particularly those of navy veterans, whose discharges do not indicate the amount of sea duty they had in World War II.

Some 40,000 Oregon veterans served in the navy during the late war, and about 80 percent of these had some sea duty. All these applications are being checked against navy records in Garden City, N. Y., and Washington D. C., to verify the amount of sea duty reported by applicants. While the procedure is slow, the department expects to save a considerable sum of money in preventing over-payments.

Gaarenstroom said the county clerks of Oregon "deserve a pat on the back" for the way they have provided veterans with certified copies of discharges to use in applying for the bonus. He also said the fact that the percentage of faulty and incomplete bonus applications is small, is due largely to the assistance given veterans and next of kin by county service officers and the veterans' organizations. About ten percent of applications received must be returned to the senders for correction. In other states paying bonuses, the figure ranged as high as 40 percent.

GRANGE PLANS DANCE
