Too Much Speed Evident In Check Of Accidents
"How fast is too fast," is a question bothering many Oregon drivers, concludes the Secretary of State's traffic safety division after a look at June accident reports received to date.

The division said most of the serious mishaps in the first half of June took place on roadways outside the limits of cities and towns, and that speed too fast for "conditions" was a main accident-causing factor.

While the speed at which an accident vehicle was proceeding may have been legal, the division said, it became too fast when the driver was unable to avoid a collision as a sudden emergency situation developed.

Even normal highway cruising speeds become dangerously fast when other traffic is making turning movements on and off the highway, safety officials pointed out. Other cues for slowing down are conditions such as slippery or rough road surfaces, congestion, curves and reductions in visibility because of rain, dust or smoke.

One effect of speed is made clear by Oregon records, the division said. Persons injured in a traffic accident at 60 miles an hour are eight times more likely to die of their injuries than persons injured at 20 miles an hour or less.
