Poorly Schooled Italian Builds Own Bridge Out Of Scrap Metal, Earns Official O.K., Also Old Age Revenue

By JACK BUSINI

FLORENCE, Italy (AP) — After 30 years of rowing across the Arno near here, Guido Bartoloni built his own bridge across the river.

Guido was born on the river one stormy night in May, 1899. His mother had refused to let his father row some passengers across alone. When his father died, Bartoloni took over the ferry business.

It was tiresome work, rowing across. Guido decided to improve his craft. With a pulley and several hundred yards of rope he managed to operate his boat while standing on one bank.

Still it was too much trouble. Before he became old and feeble, Bartoloni wanted a bridge, so his passengers could walk across the river for a small fee.

There are no bridges from Florence to Rignano, 25 miles to the east. L'Archetta, Bartoloni's home, is halfway between the two points. When he had saved about $650 he sketched a bridge and went to see the public work officials in Florence. They smiled at the drawings of this man who had gone only through the third grade. His project was rejected.

From that day on, Guido combed Tuscan looking for metal scrap to build his bridge. He bought pieces of old railway rails, war destroyed airplane hangars, and bits of wrecked factories. He spent nearly all his savings. A friend arranged a bank loan.

Working alone most of the time, Guido dug two large holes in the ground, stuck his rails upright and filled the holes with cement. Those became the bridge's pillars. From an old cableway near Piombino, he bought yards of steel cable. Then he started working in a small chair suspended from the cables. He worked for over two years. Eventually the bridge was finished.

He called his wife and asked her to bring over some chianti wine. They drank a glass each, the rest was poured on the new bridge for good luck.

Public works officials came around, tested its strength and told him it was safe enough for pedestrian traffic.

Now Guido sits in front of his little house. He charges 15 lire (2 1/2 cents) for pedestrians, and 80 lire (14 cents) for motor scooters and bicycles.
