Yale Tree Expert Compiles Report On Fir Disease

An expert on tree diseases, Dr. J. S. Boyce of Yale University, has come to the Oregon Forest Products Laboratory this summer to collect and edit four years of research reports on fomes pini, a devastating tree-decaying fungus.

This fungus has gained wide inroads into Oregon's Douglas fir forests. According to preliminary reports, fomes pini was found in 5 to 60 per cent of nearly 200 Douglas fir trees located in 14 research stands.

A professor of forest pathology, Dr. Boyce's purpose in compiling this new information is two-fold. Tabulation and interpretation of all the research on this problem since 1948 will present more accurate ways to estimate the amount of decay in a particular group of trees.

More exacting estimates will result in better timber utilization and make for less financial risk to lumber operators. It will also show the relation of internal decay to a stand of timber so it can be determined what ages and on what locations the timber should be cut to reduce losses. Older stands are more apt to carry this fungus, Dr. Boyce said.

Spores of this fungus are carried by wind and usually gain entry into a tree through the stubs of once-existing lower branches. The spores travel to the heartwood, causing decay up and down the inner tree trunk.

Conks, external tell-tale, blackish upper-surfaced knobs of from 2 to 10 inches broad, which appear in later development, make it possible to estimate the average fungus damage of a particular stand of trees.

Fomes pini research was a cooperative project of several state, federal and private agencies, including the Oregon Forest Products Laboratory and the Oregon State College School of Forestry. Bruce Wagg, research division of the State Board of Forestry, has directed the fungus project since 1951.

Dr. Boyce did the first investigations on this decay in Douglas fir when he was with the USDA division of forest pathology in Portland from 1920 to 1928. He became director of the Northeastern forest experiment station of the U. S. Forest Service in 1928. Since 1929, he has been associated with Yale University.
