Bill For Birth Catches Up After 17 Years

SPOKANE — The mills of the collection agencies grind slowly but exceedingly fine—and an opportunity, Wash., youth has a dinner for a stork trip taken more than 17 years ago to prove it. William E. Schutt was born at the Bishop Randall Hospital, Lander, Wyo., on November 24, 1935, but the bill for his birth finally caught up with him. A Colorado Springs, Colo., collection agency just sent a letter requesting payment of $58, plus $29 interest on an "overdue bill." But it isn't going to cost Schutt $87—about five years ago his father gave him the cancelled check for payment of the same Lander hospital bill. The persistent collection agency will have to stamp its bill, "paid in full," and date the receipt 1935.

Attorneys for PGE are expected to argue that the license from the federal government takes precedence over the denial by the state agency.

GI Bill Observes 8th Birthday

The G. I. Bill for World War II veterans has just celebrated its eighth birthday, with one of its benefits still in full force, another on the decline and a third long ended for most veterans. The act, signed into law on June 22, 1944, gave three major aids to veterans in their efforts to return to civilian life. One was a program of guaranteed loans for homes, farms and businesses; another, free education and training; and a third, allowances for unemployment and self-employment.

The G. I. loan program has five more years to run, coming to an end for most veterans on July 25, 1957. So far, according to the Veterans Administration, more than three million veterans have obtained G. I. loans totaling $18,000,000. Half that amount was guaranteed or insured by the VA. Ninety per cent of the loans have gone to veterans to buy or build homes.

Veterans have proved to be good loan risks, the VA reports. Only one-half of one per cent of the loans have been defaulted to the point where the VA has had to make good the guaranteed portions to the lender. The G. I. Bill's education and training program reached its cut-off point for most veterans on July 25, 1951. For the most part, the only veterans now in training are those who began before the cut-off date and who have remained in training since.

During the eight years of the program, more than half of the nation's 15,200,000 World War II veterans have taken some form of training under the G. I. Bill. Hundreds of thousands have trained for occupations directly related to America's defense efforts.

Gen. MacArthur's Speech At GOP Session Probably Marked Real 'Fade Away'

By JAMES MARLOW
WASHINGTON — When General MacArthur disappeared into the applauding platform crowd after delivering his keynote speech at the Republican National Convention he may really have begun his fade away from American public life, or at least its political life.

He was a Taft man. So long as the presidential nomination, MacArthur had a chance for the vice presidential spot. There was even talk MacArthur might be considered for President if Taft and General Eisenhower stalemated each other. But the door slammed shut on all hopes MacArthur might have had for high elective office when the nomination went to Eisenhower. Two generals on one ticket would have been one too many, anyway. And there was no reason why Eisenhower should want him on the ticket. There was no love lost between them.

Because his pre-convention hostility to Eisenhower was no secret and because their foreign policy views were so opposite, it is unlikely MacArthur would offer to stump for Eisenhower or that Eisenhower would want him to. — His Last Chance

This undoubtedly was MacArthur's last chance for the White House or the vice presidency. When he appeared before the convention in civilian clothes he looked like what he is: An old man. By the time the 1956 conventions roll around MacArthur will obviously be too old for consideration. He'd be 76.

Neither his appearance nor his speech was a sensation. He got an ovation but the following night former President Hoover got a bigger one. And there were yawns as MacArthur picked his way through his long and carefully prepared address. The yawns may have been due to his complicated sentences. Or maybe what he had to say had become an old story.

MacArthur had to endure two humiliating climaxes to his distinguished career: His defeat at the Yalu River after almost winning in Korea; and, for his later conduct, his recall by President Truman who stripped him of his command. In his memorable address to Congress 15 months ago he indicated he would just fade away, like other old soldiers.

Instead of fading, he remained conspicuously in the public eye with either other major speeches which, although he denied he was in politics, were political speeches. They were directed with increasing heat against the Truman administration which humiliated him. But they contained another main theme: Defense of himself. If the Truman administration had tried to prevent his Chicago appearance, because he is still on active duty, MacArthur might have been a sensational figure in convention considerations. Instead, the administration followed the line it apparently decided upon in dealing with him: It was avoided making him a rallying point, provided him with no crises, and let him run his course. His present position has at least one advantage: If he does make any more speeches to hurt the administration which hurt him, he can hardly be accused of having any personal political ambitions left.

It has been asserted that some groups of people depend so much on gestures to supplement speech that they cannot carry on a conversation in the dark, but the assertion has been widely disputed.
