Wrong Ideas About Education Told By Professor Of Teachers College

By DAVID TAYLOR MARKE
A P Newsfeatures Writer
This is a good time to review some of the false ideas parents entertain about education.
Professor Howard F. Fehr, head of the Department of Mathematics at Columbia University's Teachers College, says that, contrary to the belief of many parents, most children like going to school today, and enjoy learning. The sooner parents realize this and revise some of their other ideas about schools and teaching, the better will the school program flourish. He says:

"Most persons are accustomed to thinking of the schools in terms of their own experience and instruction, received 20 or 30 years ago. Today the schools are different in what they seek to accomplish, in methods and devices they use in teaching, in the psychology of learning they apply, and in the attitude of youngsters toward school.

Chief Goals Listed
"It is also a false idea that memorizing basic skills in reading, writing and arithmetic is the main goal of education. While it is an important goal, it is not primary. The chief goal is the development of physical health, mental and emotional stability, fine personality and effective citizenship."

The idea is also false, says Professor Fehr, that since the basic skills are not primary, we no longer teach them. We teach them differently, and better, because children do better in these subjects today than did children 20, 30 and 100 years ago, as revealed in national tests.

Another false concept is that children must pass a stiff test to be promoted from grade to grade and, eventually, to graduate.
He says:

"In the past, the necessity to pass an examination in order to meet social and home approval has made more dishonorable young men and women than any other school device.

Success Without College
This leads to another false idea, he continues—that we are not maintaining standards and are pampering children:

"Discipline has fled to the wind, it is said. On the contrary, modern education seeks to develop social responsibility and respect for the rights of others."

One of the most grievous false ideas, says Dr. Fehr, is the one that the only path to a highly successful life is through academic achievement—a college education.
He explains:

"Flunking French does not make a better or happier store manager; failing algebra does not produce a better truck driver. We all have various capacities. Some should go to college. But millions of Americans are living happy lives of service without a college education, and will continue to do so. If a boy or girl is not academically inclined, he should adapt himself to a more general and functional education, and parents should concur in this."

Owen Wister's Papers Given Congress Library
WASHINGTON (AP)—The Library of Congress has been presented the papers and correspondence of Owen Wister, author of "The Virginian," which contained the line "when you say that, smile."
About 11,000 papers were given the library by Wister's children. They include original drafts of many of the author's western novels, short stories and essays, his notebooks, and correspondence with friends such as Ernest Hemingway, Rudyard Kipling, Henry James and Theodore Roosevelt. Wister died 14 years ago Monday in North Kingstown, R. I.

At the turn of the century, Wister came to the little frontier town of Winthrop in Eastern Washington's Methow Valley.
It was in a log cabin there that he wrote "The Virginian," after gathering much of his material in Wyoming. Wister was reported to have laid the scene of "The Virginian" in Wyoming because the Okanagan country was unknown as a cattle range.
Mrs. E. C. Storey of Winthrop was credited with being the original of "Molly Wood," the fragile Vermont school teacher who came to the "Wild West" and succumbed to the wooing of the handsome "Virginian."
