

Former Glendale Boy's Success Story Told In Oregonian

By MRS. GERALD B. FOX
The Northwest Magazine section of the Portland Oregonian for Aug. 4 carried a two-page feature article about Les Pete, formerly of Glendale. Pete has topped a career as an outstanding high school and college athlete and high school coach by publishing, since about a year ago, a slick-paper state sports magazine, Oregon Sports. The magazine, which now has some 4,000 subscribers, is published in Forest Grove, near which Pete now has his home.

The June, 1952, issue is of particular interest to Glendale people since it featured southwest Oregon with articles and pictures on teams and stars of Bandon, Coos Bay, Coquille, Drain, Glendale, Grants Pass, Klamath Falls, Medford, North Bend and Roseburg. Les Pete first reached sports prominence while attending high school in Glendale, and in college in Albany where he was selected as the outstanding player for the year.

His mother, Suzan Pete, and his sister, Mrs. Bill Gibson, still live in Glendale. Another sister is a resident of Grants Pass. Mr. Pete is married and has four children, Michael, Jimmy, Billy and Barbara, whose ages range from seven years to three months.

There will be an all-church picnic next Sunday afternoon at 1:30 p.m. at the Glendale City Park. Terry Coleman, granddaughter of Mrs. Jerry Ricker of Glendale, cut an artery in one hand while swimming in Cow Creek near Azalea Monday. It was necessary to apply first aid to get the bleeding stopped before taking her to Grants Pass for medical attention.

Mr. and Mrs. Floyd Ames of Glendale returned Thursday of last week from a four-day trip to Portland, where Mr. Ames underwent a check-up at the Veterans' Hospital in Vancouver. Doctors pronounced Ames in good shape following his recent operation. While in the Portland area, they visited with Mr. Ames' daughter, Mildred Hopkins, and with Grace Horton and her daughter and son-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Forrest Dasher, in Battle Ground, Wash.

David Douglas Of Fir Tree Fame Uses 'Magic' To Calm Indians In Pageant Episode

By KEN METZLER
(This is the third of a series of articles describing each of the five episodes of the Umpqua Cavalcade.)

Indians in Episode 3 of the big Centennial Pageant are bewildered by "magic" displayed by David Douglas, for whom the Douglas Fir is named.

Portrayed in the "Hunting and Trapping" episode of the Cavalcade, Douglas is sent by the London Horticultural Society to examine botanical specimens.

Touring Oregon, his main interest is in trees and in one scene he shoots down a cone from one of the big trees to examine it more closely.

This brings out a horde of antagonistic Indians, but the clever Douglas calms them with his own brand of magic — he starts a fire with a magnifying glass and creates a fiery spectacle by placing gun powder on the fire.

Later he meets the returning Jeejediah Smith, survivor of an Indian Massacre portrayed in Episode 2.

Smith and a party of trappers from Hudson Bay Co. sit around a campfire and sing Kubik's "Every Female is a Torso." Next Ewing Young drives by with a great herd of cattle. He's singing a lonesome song, "Along About Cook Creek." The famed Applegate expedition led by Jesse and Lindsay Apple-settlers at Port Orford brings on the "Battle Rock" incident. The group is attacked by Indians and 11 men withdraw to a rock off the coast where they fight off repeated Indian attacks for four days.

The rock was later dubbed "Battle Rock." Finally the men are able to escape and make their way to a location near Gardiner.

The Cornwall party enters the Cavalcade with the establishment of the first cabin in Douglas County.

Episode 3 ends with the return of the Applegate party from Ft. Hall, Ida., to announce they had found it — a new route to Oregon. It's called the Applegate Trail or the "Oregon Trail, Southern Route."

The small wagon train is hailed by a choral group singing "Conestoga Way."

The episode is under the direction of Mrs. Joe Mathews.
