Vice Presidential Nominee's Death Before Election Day Would Create Knotty Problem For Either Party

WASHINGTON (AP)—A MARLOW
 What happens if one of the presidential or vice presidential candidates dies before election day next November?

Chance for an accident may be greater this year. The candidates are going to campaign by plane as well as train. A fatal accident to one of them would leave his party without a nominee unless a successor could be picked before election day.

Democrats and Republicans have been thinking of this for years, and doing something about it. Before each campaign they make arrangements to protect themselves, just in case.

The two parties' plans for such an event are partly but not identical.

The Democrats — While the delegates to the Democratic National Convention every four years name the party's two candidates, just before closing they take out insurance by voting to continue a rule adopted long ago.

The rule says that if either of the candidates dies before election day the Democratic National Committee will pick some one in his place. This committee — 106 men and women from the states and territories — runs the party between conventions.

The Republicans — The Republican convention delegates, after making their presidential and vice presidential choices every four years, vote to have a replacement made this way if death overtakes one of their candidates.

1. Their Republican National Committee can do it. It has 138 men and women members from the states and territories.

2. Or, this committee can call another national convention, if it wants to and if there is time to do so before election day.

The committee members, most of all of them, would probably want instructions from their states or territories on how to vote. This might cause a bit of a mess.

Neither party has made provision for instruction of committee members by their state organizations. They'd have to work this out by themselves.

1912 Death Recalled
 In 1912 James Sherman, vice presidential candidate on the Republican ticket headed by President Taft, died on Saturday before election day. The Republicans had no time to replace him. It didn't matter much. They lost.

In 1860 the Democratic party split in two; one faction called itself the Independent Democrats, the other the Democrats. The former nominated Stephen A. Douglas for president and Benjamin Fitzpatrick for vice president.

Fitzpatrick declined the nomination. The Independent National Committee then named Herschel V. Johnson as vice presidential candidate. That was the year the other half of the party, calling itself just the Democrats, picked J. C. Breckenridge for president and Joseph Lane vice president.

It was also the year the Republicans won with Abraham Lincoln.
