people the flame of freedom, who is dedicated to the liberation of his fellows."

He said these three steps are "immediate in their urgency."

The speech was entirely devoted to an examination of the threat to the United States, how it came about, and the methods used by the Russians. In that framework, Eisenhower found the opportunity to touch on some points that have been political arguments for the Republicans.

He spoke of corruption in government with the words: "Let us bend ourselves to end corruption in public office, at every level of government. In world opinion and in world effectiveness, the United States is no better, no more efficient, no stronger than the moral firmness of its public officials."

American government.

"Although we must say it in sadness and shame, as well as anger, they have succeeded in penetrating our own ranks, even at times into our government," Eisenhower said.

He referred to waste and extravagance, and said they are a result of fear and hysteria. He added:

"Fear is a climate that nourishes bankruptcy in dollars and morals alike. Those afraid seek security in a heedless extravagance that breeds waste of substance and corruption of men."

"From this time forward, we Americans cannot tolerate the preparation and execution of our program in a climate of fear and hysteria."

He said the American Legion "has helped cleanse the American government and American communities of subversive influence and traitorous conspiracy." And he pledged himself to cooperate with the Legion in that work.
