in Maryland, West Virginia, Delaware and New York City. Arrangements were made for stand-in speeches by Sen. J. William Fulbright (D-Ark.) and possibly Vice President Alben Barkley until Stevenson can pick up his schedule again.

Only four campaign days remained before election as the governor decided his home-state problem superseded his quest for votes.

He reached the decision immediately after addressing a wildly-cheering audience of 13,000 that packed Hunt Armory in the Pennsylvania steel center of Pittsburgh. Stevenson appeared his usual jaunty self as he charged the "great crusade" of his Republican opponent, Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower, had become "the great masquerade."

He pounded the theme, as he had in whistleblowing across Pennsylvania from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh, that the general had abandoned the principles of Abraham Lincoln and succumbed to the Republican party "Old Guard."

"I suppose," Stevenson said, "it was by deliberate choice that the Republican candidate decided to abandon the Lincoln tradition which had been re-awakened in the Republican party last spring.

"To be sure, he talked of Lincoln when he came to Illinois, as he did of Gen. George C. Marshall in the East, but not in Wisconsin; as he did like a lion about civil rights in New York, and like a purring kitten in the South."

Stevenson said "every piece of evidence indicates that Sen. Robert A. Taft (R-Ohio) writes the candidate's domestic policy, except when he is in the East, and then someone else cuts the pattern to fit the cloth—I mean the vote."

He declared, "The Old Guard accomplished something the last time it was in power. It brought eggs down to a dime a dozen. The rest of the story you remember—almost no one had a dime."

Stevenson held that the so-called Republican prosperity of the 1920s benefited only about 5 per cent of the people but that under Democratic administrations "in the 20 years following 1929 the income of 99 families out of 100 whose earnings are lowest — and that's just about everybody—have more than doubled."
