Scarcity Of Oregon Prison Riots Ascribed To Success Of School, Pastime Set-Ups

By PAUL W. HARVEY JR.
SALEM (AP) — The five-time loser was talking the other day about prison riots and told why he thinks the Oregon penitentiary hasn't had its share of the nationwide epidemic of prison trouble.

This is what he said:
"Warden O'Malley's new education and recreation programs are what's holding this place together. The men now have hope that something is being done for them, and convicts don't riot as long as they have hope."

This man's an authority on prison life. You would be, too, if you were serving your fifth term as he is.

Under the new educational program, the convicts can take any course from the first grade through college. These courses are provided either by the state school system or the State Board of Higher Education.

There are 250 of the 1,525 convicts now going to school.

Both the educational and recreational programs are being run on a shoestring, but both will be expanded.

Eight Convicts Assist

J. Parker Lineberry, a former Salem grade school principal who came to the prison 2 1/2 years ago to run the school program, has only one assistant. He is Richard Gilbert, Eugene, a recent graduate of the University of Oregon.

Lineberry and Gilbert teach, assisted by eight convicts who never taught before.

The men graduating from the eighth grade and high school at the prison are given certificates by the State Department of Education, which are as good as diplomas.

The average education of the convicts when they enter prison is only eighth grade, and some sociologists think this lack of schooling is a big factor in crime.

A few days ago the State Education Department gave its three-day high school graduation examinations to 16 convicts. Fifteen of them passed, and soon they will take part in the prison's first high school graduation exercises.

First Graduates Total 11

The first grade school graduation was held last April, with 11 inmates graduating.

The classes are held in a single large, noisy room, but in a year or so, there will be a modern 17-room school. The men attend classes a half day, and study in their cells.

Lineberry would like to install some vocational courses, too. The only vocational course now taught is baking.

When a man enters prison, the penitentiary classification committee decides what treatment the man needs to be prepared to go back into society. This committee decides who goes to school.

Lineberry says he has had only a few men who won't study. These men are kicked out of school, as are others who don't show steady progress.

Nobody can play hooky from the school because strict attendance records are kept.

There are a dozen convicts who
