RAIN-MAKING is no longer a job for the Medicine Man. Today it is a growing science, pioneered and put to practical use by American industry. Rain clouds, chemicals and the weatherman's know-how are the tools employed to help increase rainfall and snowpack during natural storm conditions.

COPCO management has been interested in cloud seeding since the experimental stage. Convinced of the potential benefits to the area it serves, the Company instituted a long-range program to increase precipitation. If, as is expected, cloud seeding proves successful, it will mean a real water bargain for everybody. Not only will it provide more hydroelectric power, but there will be more water for farmers, stockgrowers, lumbermen and urban residents.

Push-button weather is still a project for the future. In the meantime, COPCO will continue its cloud seeding program, working toward the goals of producing more electric power for your use; conserving our natural resources and providing more water for the people of California and Oregon.
