Textual Highlights Listed From President's Message

WASHINGTON (AP) — Textual highlights of President Eisenhower's letter transmitting his annual economic report to Congress Thursday:

Economic well-being sustains our whole national life. A high and rising standard of living brings to more of our people the opportunity for continued intellectual and spiritual growth.

The need of our times is for economic policies that, in the first place, recognize the proven sources of sustained economic growth and betterment, and in the second place, respect the need of people for a sense of security as well as opportunity in our complex, industrialized society.

With wise management of the national household, our country can within a decade increase its production from the current and annual level of about 360 billion dollars to 500 billions, or more, expressed in dollars of the same buying power.

The year 1954 was one of transition from contraction to recovery. . . . The contraction was relatively mild and brief, because of a variety of timely public and private actions.

Although manufacturing production fluctuated, total output was fairly stable, and disposable personal income reached record levels.

Some industries and localities suffered from serious unemployment. The fortunes of most of them turned for the better when recovery got under way in the early autumn, and they will benefit from further general economic expansion.

Instead of expanding federal enterprises or initiating new spending programs, the basic policy of the government in dealing with the contraction was to take actions that created confidence in the future and stimulated business firms, consumers, and states and localities to increase their expenditures.

The vigor of the recent recovery . . . holds out the promise that we shall achieve a high and satisfactory level of employment and production within the current year.

It is essential to keep a close watch on financial developments; continued economic recovery must not be jeopardized by overemphasis of speculative activity.

The wise course for government in 1955 is to direct its program principally toward fostering long-term economic growth rather than toward imparting an immediate upward thrust to economic activity.

Our nation's recent history teaches that a foresighted government can do much to help keep the economy stable, but experience affords no good basis for a belief that the government can entirely prevent fluctuations.
