30 Per Cent Increase In T & I Program Noted At Senior High

Student interest in the trade and industrial education class offered at Roseburg High School reached a new high this year. An increase of 30 per cent was recorded, reports Adult Education Director Richard Boss.
 Currently, 21 boys and six girls are in the program. Boss says local employer interest "coupled with a good business year" seems to explain the climb.
 Participants in T & I receive payment as soon as they enter the program.
 The pay scale is set according to the training standards previously drawn up by individuals experienced in the trade. Federal laws require apprentice pay one-half of journeyman pay.
 In actuality, T & I is a general heading for all occupations of a trade or industrial type. A trade, said Boss, is a skill that takes as many hours to learn AND as many years to obtain as a college degree. This averages 2,000 hours per year.
 Boss feels the community can be proud of the program. Most of the T & I students stay on in the job they've trained for, the director said. Often they become supervisors and owners of local businesses.

Must Be 16 Years Old

The program is set up to allow students to work a half day in before graduation. Upon graduation they "merely go to work a full day," Boss said. Students in the T & I class must be 16 and either a junior or senior in high school.
 Parental understanding is a must requirement, the AE director added. Parents must be willing to cooperate and their written consent is required before any student is accepted. The school is consulted, too. The student has to be doing "at least average work" and must be recommended by the dean of boys or girls.
 Although the money from the job is not a portion of the program emphasized, Boss says it often is a great help to the student's family. Often, it has given some youths an opportunity to finish school.
 Two main purposes are stressed in the course: (1) To present some of the general information needed by persons in employment along a liberal arts line; and (2) to provide the student with material and guides to his study of the technical information he needs to prepare him for a better position.

Water Supply 'Stretchable,' Say Experts

Oregon farmers in areas that may be hit with below normal supplies of irrigation water this year can "stretch" the supply by cutting down field losses from runoff and excessive seepage, report Oregon State College and U.S. Department of Agriculture scientists.
 OSC soils scientist A. W. Marsh says only 54 per cent of water delivered by furrows was cropped during trials on 16 Owyhee project farms. About one-third of the water turned down the furrows ran off the lower end of the field never reaching plant roots. About one-sixth "percolated" or seeped below crop roots, draining to the water table below the soil.
 These losses can be reduced tremendously, the scientists believe, by shortening irrigation time, by reducing amount of water in each furrow and by increasing the soil's water intake rate.
 A sample of soil from the root zone is one way to tell when enough water has been applied. On 13 of the 16 test farms, irrigation time could have been reduced from an average of 52 hours down to 41 hours.
 Another water-saver, say the scientists, is to apply plenty of water at first—enough to reach the end of the furrow in one-fourth the irrigation time. Then cut the flow down to maintain just a trickle off the lower end.
 Water flow can best be regulated through use of syphon tubes from the feeder ditch to furrows. These plastic or aluminum "spiles" can be varied in size or number per furrow for accurate water control. Such control is difficult with shovel-controlled irrigation.
 The soil's water intake rate can be increased by reducing the width between furrows and flattening the slope of the furrow. These steps, says Marsh, increase the amount of soil surface exposed to water, decrease irrigation time, and save water.

Cooties Order Grand Council To Meet Sunday

The Military Order of Cooties, Grand Pup Tent of Oregon, will hold a grand council of administration in Roseburg Sunday, with Poseyville Pup Tent 2 acting as host.
 Saturday night there will be a third-degree scratch followed by a party and dance at the Veterans Memorial Building on Garden Valley Road, according to A. E. (Bus) Williams, past grand commander of Oregon.
 Sunday morning at 10 is the time for the council of administration. Main item for discussion will be the grand convention at Ocean Lake in July in conjunction with the state Veterans of Foreign Wars convention. A dinner is slated at noon Sunday.
 Grand Commander Ted Hopkins of Rogue River, Junior Vice Commander Fred Corn of Hillsboro and other officers and delegates from throughout the state will be on hand. Cootiettes and Lady Bugs will hold meetings at the same time. All three groups are primarily interested in hospital work, in which Oregon has led the nation for several years.
 Handling local arrangements for the host Poseyville Pup Tent will be Ed Hoover, seam squirrel; Frosty Holmes, grand council member, and Nelson Tobias, blanket bum.

Bodily Hurts Seen As Cancer Threat

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — Injuries to body organs may be a factor in inducing cancer, according to Yakima, Wash., scientists.
 Dr. Howard L. Richardson, pathologist at the medical center laboratory in Yakima, reported his findings here to the American Assn. for Cancer Research, at its annual meeting here.
 Dr. Richardson told of experiments in which rats were fed butters yellow, a chemical known to cause liver cancer in male animals. He used three groups of rats. One group had their liver pricked three or four times during the experiment. Another group had their abdomens punctured. A third group was uninjured.
 Dr. Richardson said only those rats with their livers pricked showed signs of liver cancers. Those with their abdomens punctured and those not injured showed no signs of liver cancer during the period of the experiment.
