Children To Age 15, Pregnant Women Eligible

PORTLAND (AP)—Children up to the age of 15 and pregnant women now may obtain Salk polio vaccine, the Oregon State Board of Health announced Tuesday.

This easing of the restrictions—the age limit had been 5 to 9 years—followed a Monday evening telephone conference of the state polio vaccine advisory committee.

Dr. Samuel B. Osgood, state epidemiologist, said that about 50,000 children in the 5-to-9 group have received the basic two shots of the vaccine and all other children in that group have had an opportunity to get their first shot.

Oregon has already received more than 200,000 doses of the vaccine and more is being released at the rate of 100,000 cubic centimeters a month, Dr. Osgood said.

This rate, he said, means that two doses can be provided for all those eligible under the new restrictions as fast as private physicians can administer them.

There are about 510,000 additional persons now eligible for Salk vaccine in the state, Dr. Osgood estimated, and at the present rate of manufacture all of these will have an opportunity to have two inoculations before the peak of the next polio season.

The Oregon action followed by one day the national advisory committee's recommendation of eased restrictions throughout the country.
