

Carbon Tests Indicate Men Lived Here 8,000 Year Ago

LINCOLN, Neb. (AP) — Tests on radioactive carbon indicate that men lived in Oregon 8,000 years ago and the area has been continuously inhabited since.

Results of the tests with an "atomic calendar" were given in a report to the Society of American Archeology at Lincoln by scientists from the University of Oregon and from Yale University.

The report was on the results of studies by Luther S. Cressman, Oregon anthropologist, and Edward S. Deevey Jr., director of Yale's geochronometric laboratory.

The studies had been made in excavations at the Five Mile Rapids on Oregon's side of the Columbia River. Cressman directed the field work, which yielded fossils and charcoal. Deevey tested the science's newest yardstick for fixing dates.

Cressman probed into the archeological site as far down as the 8,000-year level, finding fossils and such artifacts as a polished antler tip which had been used for cutting; the base of a harpoon prong, and a flint knife, shaped by percussion flaking — a process dating back a million years.

At the more ancient levels — from 7,500 years to 8,000 years, Cressman said fossil remains of condors were found. And along with the condor fossils were found those of 624 different and individual birds, including such types as the bald eagle, gull, gryllon and magpie.

Cressman also found fossil remains of fish and seals. He explained these suggest that the Oregon area studied was in an "estuary-like condition and that the food economy of these early inhabitants was already adapted to a maritime status."
