Sleeping Sickness Threat Seen In East Washington

SEATTLE — A slight but definite threat of sleeping sickness faces campers in eastern Washington, a spokesman for the State Health Department said Thursday.

Dr. W. R. Giedt, epidemiologist, said several illnesses in human patients are being investigated. An outbreak of the disease — known as equine encephalitis — occurred in 53 horses in eastern areas of the state.

The disease is transmitted to humans by mosquitoes. Direct contact with horses is not in itself dangerous, Dr. Giedt said. He suggested campers use protective clothing, insecticides, repellants or other means of combating mosquitoes.

WHEN BOWL WAS WOODEN

DALLAS — Forerunner of the Cotton Bowl was a wooden bowl built in 1921 to handle 15,000. The first capacity crowd saw Baylor and SMU play in the wooden bowl in 1923.
