Thomson, died Nov. 29 of bulbar polio in a Bellingham hospital.

The health department said James had received three doses of the vaccine at proper three-month intervals. The final dose was given in August.

Dr. Lucien Coquet, Skagit County health officer, said the three-month interval in the shots made it impossible for there to be any relationship between the inoculation and the disease.

"It never was claimed that Salk vaccine is 100 per cent effective in providing immunization," he said.

SEATTLE — The State Health Department Tuesday reported the polio death of a 15-year-old high school boy who had received the full three doses of Salk vaccine.

Health officers said they were advised by the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis that the death of James Thomson was the first such case reported in the nation. They said the boy was probably one of the few persons who do not respond to immunization.
