Radio Network Fails In Civil Defense Test

SALEM — The failure of the civil defense radio network in Oregon to operate Friday in the defense exercise has left officials wondering what might have happened if the attack had been real.

Arthur M. Sheets, state civil defense director, said his agency was able to resort to telephones this time, but such an attack as simulated Friday would knock out the phones, too.

Sheets said the only answer is to continue the fight for more and better frequencies. He added that unless this is done the state civil defense "won't be able to keep the military in business."

The network operates between the state headquarters and the counties. It operates satisfactorily at night, Sheets added.

Other things went smoothly, Sheets said. He added that they had expected a five megaton bomb on the Portland city center instead of the two megaton weapon, but they had guessed correctly on the one megaton device which was used in the simulated attack on the Portland International Airport.

State civil defense officials had trouble in verifying the make-believe bombing of Grand Coulee Dam, but several hours after the supposed attack, received confirmation. It would send a 29 or 30 foot wall of water into the heart of Portland, civil defense officials said.

Another Damage Action Filed Naming County

A companion action against Douglas County and a county employee for $25,150 was filed Friday by Patricia Morgan in Circuit Court.

The damage action arises out of the same traffic accident for which Patricia's mother, Mrs. Joyce N. Morgan, Chico, Calif., filed a complaint Thursday seeking $37,412. The complaints both name the county and Alfred E. Ervine as defendants.

They allege that a truck driven by Ervine struck a car carrying the two plaintiffs on Highway 99 south of Roseburg Aug. 18, 1955. The action by Patricia, through her guardian ad litem, Edna E. McKean, asks payment for a brain concussion and sprained cervical spine resulting in impaired vision claimed to be a result of the accident.
