RESOURCE PROTECTION

By Charles V. Stanton

July issue of the magazine Fishing World looses an editorial blast against sports fish hogs. Regulations are demanded to keep sports anglers, as well as commercial fishermen, within conservation bounds.

The commercial fisherman has been limited in his take. Laws have been formed to protect fish in fresh water. Action is being taken belatedly to reduce water pollution below the level of danger to fish life, all with the laudable purpose of rehabilitating a dwindling resource, says the sports magazine.

It points out that "some so-called sportsmen are as big a threat to tomorrow's fishing as anything in or on the water."

The editorial is directed toward those anglers who catch more fish than they need or can use, simply to have the sport of making big catches.

The editorial refers particularly to those areas where salt water sports angling is not controlled or regulated and where anglers can take an unlimited number of fish, to be thrown away or used as fertilizer because the catch is too large to be used for food.

The writer declares:

Make no mistake about it, a fish hog is a man driven by a superficial and thoughtless greed. He can only stop if he begins to see what he is doing. Anyone who thinks the problem unreal has only to ponder the fate of our fresh-water fishing, think how many expensive miles a man has to travel for a half-dozen brook trout, a couple of decent bass or a single 30-inch pike. Our rivers and lakes once teemed with these great creatures. The ocean seems limitless by comparison, but so is the appetite of some fishermen.

Anglers Impatient

The problem discussed in Fishing World already has been recognized here in Oregon. But a great many anglers are impatient with bag limit regulations imposed by the Oregon Game Commission and are seeking to gain authority to catch more fish. The fact that commercial fishing in coastal rivers has been halted will increase pressure on the Game Commission to boost the salmon bag limit.

Not all sports anglers desiring to catch more fish than the present law allows are fish hogs. The great number are prepared to utilize their catch for food, both by freezing and canning. They feel they should have the right to take all the salmon they can use properly.

Resort owners, too, would like changes in bag limits. Many tourists would stay much longer if they could take more fish. The number now allowed on a sports license is not enough to cause tourists to wait for a second week's limit. Tourist income to motels, resorts, charter boats, tackle shops, etc., could be boosted materially if the present landing law were to be repealed.

Should Protect Resource

It is the opinion of the editorial writer of Fishing World that the resource must be protected against whatever threat exists, whether that threat comes from commercial fishing, pollution, sports fishing, or other. I fully concur in the argument that the resource comes first.

The salmon industry along the Pacific Coast has been declining very rapidly. It has reached a dangerous stage. It has been the belief of many conservationists that one of several reasons for the decline was to be found in commercial netting inside the mouths of our coastal streams; that by eliminating netting more fish could reach spawning beds and that the decline in the resource could be stopped.

Even though we stop the decline we have not yet proven that the resource can be restored to prior abundance. Only time will tell whether the salmon runs can be rebuilt to something like earlier levels.

If we are to protect the resource, we should guard it first against excessive predation. At the same time we should strive to improve habitat. Finally, we should keep the harvest in line with production.

Sports fishermen should control their impatience, should recognize the necessity for strict regulations, and should cooperate in conservation measures. Those who fail to do so are deserving of the words of condemnation voiced by the editor of the sports magazine.

IN THE DAY'S NEWS

By FRANK JENKINS

weed pollen per square yard are enough to start the hay fever snuffles and sniffles.

Even ragweed, however, has its uses.

Consider, for example, the little town of Kane, in Pennsylvania. It is located "high up" in what back East they call the Allegheny "mountains." Its elevation is 2200 feet above sea level. It is surrounded by forests. Ragweed finds life difficult at this "high" altitude. Whereas other sections of the East may report pollen counts in the hundreds, Kane reports proudly that its pollen count runs from zero to a top of nine.

The residents of the town don't rely upon nature alone. There is a city ordinance outlawing the offending weed. Each year the chamber of commerce, the Garden club, the Boy Scouts and all the service organizations get together and comb the town in search of any ragweed that might dare to show its head. If they find one, they give it the works.

Why this anti-ragweed phobia?

The answer is simple and understandable. The town of Kane MAKES ITS Living (in reverse, of course) out of the ragweed. It work like this:

When the hay fever season begins hay fever sufferers from surrounding states begin to roll in — by plane, by train and by automobile. They are met by the chamber of commerce and taken in tow. Some of them are placed in the numerous hotels and motels that have been built for their accommodation. The remainder — there is reported to be always a surplus — are parked in private homes and boarding houses.

They remain until the first report of frost from their home towns tell them it is safe to go back. Meanwhile they spend their money IN KANE — whose residents find the hay fever refugees so lucrative that they can thumb their noses at adversity and live the life of Riley throughout the rest of the year.

The politicians who headquarter in Salem have been peddling a lot of gloom and doom here of late about the state of Oregon and its future. Down here in Southern Oregon we don't agree with them. We think our future is bright.

But maybe there is method in their seeming madness. They may feel that if everything else goes to pot they can chivvy the ragweed out of the area around the state capitol and live happy ever afterward on the hay fever sufferers who will come there to get away from it all.

Misprint Leaves Phrase In Letter Meaningless

In a recent plea for better support for our city busses, someone made a "boo-boo." I had asked that we "bestir ourselves." It appeared in print as "best it ourselves." Entirely without meaning.

Defense May Call Stars As Witnesses In Magazine Trial

LOS ANGELES (AP) — The door was left open Thursday for the defense to call movie stars as witnesses in the criminal libel trial of Confidential and Whisper Magazines.

Superior Judge Herbert V. Walker said he would rule on the admissability of their testimony when they take the stand.

He held in abeyance a ruling on a prosecution motion to bar the celebrities' testimony on grounds it would be immaterial.

Defense counsel Arthur J. Crowley said he wants to put the stars on the stand to ask them whether stories about them in the magazines are true.

Crowley said "I certainly am" going to call some movie stars.

"If I am able to prove quickly that this charge is as ridiculous as I think it is, I'm not going to drag out this matter indefinitely by piling up a lot of cumulative evidence," Crowley said.

By this, Crowley indicated that he probably would not call all of the more than 100 celebrities he has subpoenaed.

Sessions before the jury resumed Friday, when the prosecution plans to continue reading articles from Confidential and Whisper Magazines which it maintains are lewd and obscene. Thirteen stories were read Wednesday by Dep. Dist. Atty. William L. Ritzi and Asst. State Atty. Gen. Clarence Linn.
