A FIGHT FOR MARKETS

By Charles V. Stanton

The Cement Industry of Oregon is the title of a new organization formed by cement companies of the state to "conduct a long-range educational program on the advantages of using concrete in highway construction."

From the Portland headquarters of the new concern comes a "fact sheet" presenting claims that concrete highways, though more costly of construction, are less expensive over the years because of lower maintenance costs.

The federal-aid highway program, now in initial stages, merits a study into the uses of road-building materials. The Cement Industry of Oregon contends that the new federal-aid highways should be built with concrete. It intends to conduct a very extensive campaign to prove its point. If it succeeds, the cement companies of Oregon will profit greatly during the dozen or more years of the highway program.

I presume that Oregon's timber industry also is working up a campaign of similar nature. If it isn't, it should be, in my opinion.

The federal-aid highway program, I believe, will be a major factor in restoring the timber industry to boom status, provided the industry is on its toes.

Much Wood Required

When construction starts in every state of the Union on multi-laned superhighways there should be a huge market for wood products. Such highways involve a vast number of concrete structures. Having limited access, they must be overhead or undergrade intersecting highways. Traffic exchange devices must be built at frequent intervals. Construction of wide roads on long tangents involves a great many culverts, bridges and retaining devices. The cement industry need not worry about a greatly increased demand for its product, even if it does not obtain all the surfacing contracts.

Construction of concrete structures ordinarily utilizes wood for form lumber. Particularly desired is rough green Douglas fir, the type of lumber in which Douglas County excels in production, and fir plywood, of which Douglas County also is a major producer.

If the lumber industry plays its cards right and goes after the form lumber business on a big scale, a tremendous market for Oregon's timber, board and plywood products should be available for as many years as it takes to finish the highway project.

Competition Expected

But our Douglas fir industry can't expect to realize the full market potential unless it does a selling job.

We can anticipate that the southern pine people, who have been much more aggressive in selling campaigns than have the Douglas fir interests, will be out after the highway business. Still more vigorous competition is to be expected from the light metals industry.

Many of the highway structures will be uniform in design and specifications. Light metal forms can be fabricated for a good many of these construction jobs. Metal forms have certain advantages in that they can be used over and over. On the other hand, they are not flexible and are more difficult to fit into varied designs. No material is better than Douglas fir, when it comes to flexibility and convenience in building forms for concrete work.

No section of the United States could be more benefited from the federal-aid highway program than Douglas County, providing the timber industry does the right kind of promotion. Our mills are producing exactly the wood products most needed and most favored. But, if we are to get the business, we'll be forced to do a selling job in the face of some mighty tough competition.

The cement industry is organizing to put up an aggressive fight. It is to be hoped the timber industry also has its battle lines formed.

Reader Opinions

Curtin Still in Douglas Co., Resident Emphasizes

Has our county seat become so involved in affairs in its own area that it has completely forgotten Curtin? We suggest some of the officials come up and see just what our roads are like! We hope that they won't knock the pans off their cars or get run down by another car because of the narrow roads!

At a recent road meeting at Roseburg the County Road Commissioner, Frank Ashley, had to be told where Curtin is as well as did other officials. You would think they would know the areas within their own territory. After all, some of those votes that got them in office came from this area! Possibly they won't next election time!

We have a new restaurant and truck stop, the restaurant serving some 600 persons a day and for station serving over 100 cars a day plus all the trucks. It is wondered why this is about the only place off the new highway where it isn't paved. We are forgotten again!

It is because other communities are jealous of our good fortune of getting on the new highway?

The grange and business interests in this area are tired of explaining where Curtin is to Roseburg officials and having our requests ignored. We may be in near Lane County but we aren't in it! Bruce Boss, Sec. North Douglas Grange, Curtin, Ore.

apiently for them to nibble. There was warm, lovely water aplenty in which to swim around. All this went on throughout the year, for in the equable climate of the valley of the Rhone there was no pressing need to store up in the summer what one would need in the winter.

Under these conditions, these beavers ceased to be EAGER beavers. They became LAZY beavers. They even quit building dams. Why build dams to back up water in which to store food for the winter?

Why work when work wasn't necessary in order to eat?

Then— All of a sudden— Life CHANGED for them. A corps of engineers came along, and started to build a dam. The beavers were in the way, so the engineers moved them over into a little river called the Tave that flows into the Rhone.

That DID IT. The beavers took a long, hard look at these dam-building human engineers and realized that after a couple of centuries of the life of RILEY THEY HAD COMPETITION.

So they went to work like mad, building a dam of their own. They cut down trees. They rolled stones. They dug channels. They brought branches down the creek and put them in place and cemented them with mud and moss and leaves until the dam was water-tight and began to back up the waters of the Tave.

Then they started cutting down more trees and cutting them up into manageable lengths and storing them in the backed-up waters to provide food for the coming winter in case it happened to be a hard one.

In short— These beavers GOT COMPETITION. When they took their hole cards and went to work.

Reports from the scene of action are to the effect that they are HAPPIER THAN THEY HAVE BEEN FOR THE PAST CENTURY AND A HALF.

Work has its rewards.

Bonebrake urged wheat growers to furnish all information necessary to establish a soil bank base for their farms to the ASC as soon as possible.

This information may be submitted at the county ASC office in the court house.

The chairman said farmers taking part in any of the soil bank's acreage reserve programs must comply with two acreage limitations.

Late Summer Cold Snap Ends Quickly

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

A late-summer cold snap that sent temperatures dropping to record lows in parts of the Pacific Northwest came to an abrupt end Friday.

The Weather Bureau even forecast above normal temperatures for the next five days and said the mercury should reach into the 70s in Washington, Oregon and northern Idaho.

The frigid Arctic air mass that dropped the mercury below freezing in inland areas Thursday moved on and dawn brought a balmy summer day.

Spokane, which had an unofficial low of 29 the day before, had a minimum reading of 47 Friday, the same as Seattle.

It was 57 at Ellensburg, 53 at Walla Walla, 40 at Yakima and 39 at Coeur d'Alene, Idaho. Cut Bank, Mont., which had a low of 14 Thursday, enjoyed a minimum of 35 Friday.

The Weather Bureau said another cold air mass moved into northern British Columbia and warned it might flick at the eastern half of the Pacific Northwest by Sunday. But temperatures weren't expected to reach the low levels of Thursday.

Summer comes to an official end Sunday night.
