U.S. Must Supply 20 Million More People For Jobs

AMHERST, Mass. (AP) — The United States faces a crisis in the next few years in providing some 20 million additional people, properly equipped, for its work-force — all the way from professional and technical personnel to management, craftsmen and others, a manufacturers' seminar was told Saturday.

By 1965, the manufacturers were told, proportionately fewer men workers between 25 and 44 will be available than ever before.

Under Secretary of Labor James T. O'Connell said in an address prepared for a meeting of the Associated Industries of Massachusetts, that from now on — to make sure of national safety — every person must have a chance for all the training, all the education, all the opportunity he or she can profitably absorb.

In five years, he said, the number of craftsmen under 25 years old "has actually declined by 28 per cent."
