Canine Problem Weighty Matter

SEATTLE — Russian scientific advances, the French crisis, the U.S. economy, the Mediterranean situation are all simple nuts to crack compared to a shaggy problem facing Seattle's city fathers Tuesday.

The problem? What to do about Seattle's canine residents.

Since the city electorate passed a dog leash ordinance, the problem has been as slippery to handle as a Labrador retriever pup with his first downed duck.

Carrying out the ordinance, says the King County Humane Society, will cost more money about $60,000 a year. City council members, with an eye to an already tight budget, have turned to an old standby, the committee, to "investigate the facts in the case."

Monday, the problem came to a head with an announcement from the county Humane Society that it won't act as city poundmaster after August 20.

"We" quoth the society, "will cheerfully cooperate in returning the duties to the city."
