

Protection and perpetuation of wildlife habitat and resource management planning to "meet the onslaught of the future" was the keynote sounded by Seth Gordon, director of the California Fish and Game Department as principal speaker at the semi-annual convention banquet of the Oregon Wildlife Federation held at Bend during the past weekend.

The principle and policies expressed by the keynote speaker were repeated in the addresses and in resolutions and motions by the delegates of the federation's 30 affiliated sportsmen's clubs in Oregon. Emphasis on perpetuation through natural resource management was stressed in measures restricting resource use and characterized many of the actions of the convention.

Director Gordon, one of a battery of authorities and experts in the related fields of game, fish and resource management to address the convention delegates, urged that "we fight to protect the habitat and not rely on off-shots to make up for the damage done to our resources."

He explained the organization and policies of the California state department game and fish management program, administered under a five-region structure, with a director responsible for each region.

Phil Behrstocker, director of the Oregon Game Commission, also stressed the importance of resource management and conservation in his lecture named as the seminar was primarily concerning fish and game conservation. The migration of salmonine fish and the wholeness of the breeding and spawning water resources were stressed.

"A declining factor in the problem of producing salmonine fish is the tendency to look for permanent," Behrstocker stated. He pointed out the need for unregulated natural environment increase in the open concept of water development, as most fisheries decline to the spawning."
