Dr. Conant Says Schools Too Small

PORTLAND (AP)—Dr. James B. Conant, former president of Harvard University, said Wednesday many Oregon schools are too small to provide a broad educational program.

Conant, who heads a national survey of high school education sponsored under a foundation grant, said that unless a high school has 100 graduates annually it is too small to provide an adequate educational program.

Some 83 per cent of Oregon high schools, attended by 35 per cent of the state's students, now graduate fewer than 100 students each year.

Conant said the smaller schools cannot maintain sufficient qualified teachers in the many specialized fields, which form the basis of a comprehensive study course. He also suggested extending the school day to include seven or eight 45 minute class periods.
