MARKET TIPS

Locally Grown Cabbage, Cauliflower On Market; Watermelons Go Begging

By LEROY B. INMAN, Business News Dept. Editor

Locally grown cabbage was found in place on the market this week as growers started harvesting limited amounts.

The quality is reported excellent, what little there is of it, but a considerable amount has to be imported to meet demand.

Another local crop appearing in cauliflower is in very limited amounts. The forecast, is for some excellent cauliflower through the fall and winter months. It was with high favor and considerable was shipped out last year.

Watermelons remain plentiful but there are no takers, even at a very low price. Demand drops off rapidly with cooler weather. Cans are relatively scarce, but some new fields are reported about ready. Sweet corn has dropped in supply and quality. However, there should be some available for local market sales after another couple of weeks.

Local tomatoes, likewise, are scarce, and it has been necessary to look to the California growers supply local needs. Usually there are plenty up until heavy rains or frosts start. Peppers grown by local farmers, however, are excellent. Large and thick meated. Blue Lake beans are about through. A few Oregon Giants are coming in from Portland.

The lettuce market is reported as a bit rough. Some of it is good and some not so good. The price on the various qualities also fluctuates. The Portland area is supplying red lettuce, romaine, endive and other salad lettuces. Radishes also are shipped out of Portland, but green onions now are mostly from California sources.

Broccoli from Salinas and Portland is again available. The quality of celery has picked up considerably and the price remains relatively stable. Brussels sprouts are again arriving from the south in larger amounts, after a relatively dry spell. Egg plant, too, is available.

Potatoes are still coming out of Washington, but should shift to the Prineville area in another 10 days. The market remains steady. The government is holding the price of No. 2's fairly stable, with its program of diverting supplies to starch supplies.

Yams have dropped in price and are reported very good. Sweet potatoes are arriving in limited amounts, but are still high. The quality is excellent. The carrot market remains firm, but other root crops, including turnips, rutabagas and beets are very reasonable on the market. They are coming out of Portland.

Washington Johnathan apples are now showing in quite appreciable lots along with Yakima Red Delicious. Summer varieties are practically gone, but there should be plenty of the winter crop in another two weeks. Reports are, however, that the Washington crop is only about 65 per cent of last year's, which was down from that a year before. This is the middle of the season for prunes, many of which are bearing. A few plums remain. The late crop is now on, mostly out of Medford, which also is the principal source of pears. Some red pears are coming from the Portland area. They are more for eating than canning.

The California grape crop remains excellent, and local demand has been exceptional.

Sale of oranges has picked up a great deal since the start of school. A local wholesaler has ordered a third shipment, after the first two have gone out rapidly. The quality is excellent, and the price is down, indicating ample supply of the Valencia crop.

The first shipment of Florida pink grapefruit arrived this week. They are from the interior and not quite as good as the coastal varieties, but still better than the California white, in most consumer's opinions. Lemons remain steady.

Softside bananas are excellent. Coconuts, pineapples and a few papayas can be found in the local market. The price remains relatively stable. A sure sign fall is near is seen in the appearance of caramels apples, popular for Halloween and Thanksgiving.
