Space Writer Gets Taste Of 'Zero-G'

By ALVIN B. WEBB JR.

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. (UPI)—The sleek, silvery F100F jet airplane streaked toward space almost with the speed of sound. Suddenly, in a graceful bow, its nose dipped back toward the fleecy white clouds.

In that moment, I recalled a scene from an old science fiction movie and reached inside my jacket. A slight bit of misjudgment on the first try sent my right hand against the oxygen mask covering my face.

Better luck the second time, and I pulled a ball-point pen from my sweater. Carefully, I held the pen up — and let go.

The slender, black object simply hung there.

A flick of the finger sent it tumbling slowly to the left side of the cabin. I tapped it with the left hand, and the pen waltzed to the right in a fascinating little dance against the sky's blue background.

Up front, Capt. Ronald E. Catton, solo pilot on the Air Force's famed Thunderbird precision flying team, was adroitly maneuvering us on a brief trip through that eerie domain of astronaut-weightlessness.

Find It Pleasant
Astronaut John H. Glenn Jr. described weightlessness — or "zero-G," as the professionals call it — "a pleasant experience." Teammate M. Scott Carpenter said he was "somewhat distracted initially" by it. Spaceman Alan B. Shepard Jr. described it as "most analogous to floating."

To a novice, all three descriptions come home true, doubled and redoubled.

A taste of "zero-G" — the one symptom of spaceflight that cannot be duplicated on the ground — was what we had in mind when Catton and I roared away from Patrick Air Force Base, Fla., and flashed over the Atlantic Ocean atop the 16,000-pound thrust "Thunderbird-6."

First came the breath-crushing "G-forces" as the jet pulled out of its dive and began climbing. My normal weight, 130 pounds, soared for a few seconds to around 450 pounds, or approximately three "G's."

Astronauts have taken nine "G's" or better on their rocket flights into space and down again. A 150-pound man facing nine "G's" would appear to weigh about 1,350 pounds.

The jet went over the invisible hump and nosed downward. Catton's calm voice came over the intercom: "You now weigh

IMPRESSIVE LOSS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (UPI) — For years Percy Jackson, 72, wanted a $5,000 bill so he could impress his friends.

A month ago, Percy converted most of his life savings into a crisp $5,000 bank note. Recently he told the police he lost it.

My legs, virtually riveted to the floor by the "G's" of a few moments before, now dangled in mid-air. My arms and the pen I toyed with floated as on an invisible bed of feathers. The heaviness of the helmet lifted and tugged gently at the straps under the chin.

Everything goes lax. The body presses lightly against the parachute harness, and there is a fleeting temptation to loosen the

We ran through it again, for a combined total of about 13 seconds in weightlessness. It seemed like minutes — and one is left wishing it could be hours.
