Elaborate Safety Measures Prevent Tragedy In Space Launchings

CAPE CANAVERAL (UPI) — For eight horrible seconds the sleek, white rocket—instead of arching harmlessly over the Atlantic—veered sharply over the heart of the Cape and aimed death and destruction toward the mainland.

He let the missile rise for a few more seconds, then triggered the switches which sent an electric impulse to an explosive package inside the Atlas.

Erupts In Flame

Instantly, the mighty missile erupted in a ball of fire 15,000 feet in the air. Chunks of flaming debris showered to the ground, some falling on the blockhouse which protected missilemen at the launch site.

The space capsule was blasted free by a rocket escape system and was dropped undamaged into the ocean by parachute. There were no injuries.

That these two unsuccessful launchings were not further marred by deaths or injuries can be attributed in large measure to what scientists here call the impact prediction system.

The complex system provides the range safety officer, the man who must trigger the "destruct" switches if necessary, with information on where the missile would impact if fuel were to be cut off during powered flight.

The system also enables recovery forces to be on the way to the scene even before the nose cone impacts.

Trains Safety Officers

As the nation's pioneer launching site, the spaceport here helps train safety officers from other bases and scores of missilemen from operational bases and military schools pass through here for observation and training.

Safety officers work closely with the launch agencies. The

CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

WASHINGTON (UPI) — Rep. Thomas Pelly, R-Wash., said Monday the Kennedy administration is playing down "Captive Nations Week" July 16-23 because it doesn't want to offend the Russians.

He said the State Department is reluctant to issue a statement on the week, which has been designated by Congress for the past four years to call attention to nations under Russian domination. Delay in issuing a statement last year made the observance almost completely ineffective, Pelly said.

launchers indicate what they would like to attain and then it is determined whether it can be done safely.

Charts are drawn covering the entire course of a planned launch. The charts show such things as distances from populated areas, islands along the route and emergency procedure.

During the launch itself several officers besides the range safety officer man various instruments to observe plotted flight data.

Because of these safety measures the potentially dangerous missile program—which involves explosives, great pressures, high voltage and super-inflammable fuels—has a safety record that outshines that of many other industries.
