

Capital March May Have United Negro Groups In Freedom Fight

By AL KUETTNER
United Press International
The battle for integration may have become "joined" during the march on Washington.

For the life of this revolutionary movement, Negroes — often quite independent in terms of how they want things accomplished — have dreamed of an "umbrella" organization that would link together their campaign and their various groups.

Up to now, the dream has not been realized. The numerous racial organizations, while becoming involved with each other occasionally, have largely gone their own way, using approaches that often conflicted, to get the most publicity or the most money.

There has been particularly sharp competition for funds, with several organizations sometimes soliciting donations at the same rally.

Cites Pioneering Work
Roy Wilkins, whose National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) has been criticized as "slow moving"

by the more militant younger groups that have sprung up in recent years, likes to remind the youngsters that the NAACP "pioneered" what's going on now.

Wilkins claims the NAACP Youth Council held the first "sit-in" in Oklahoma City, two years before four college students "originated" the idea at Greensboro in 1960.

"I started in 1932," Wilkins said. "But the first jail-ins were back in 1918 and there were freedom rides in 1915. So this is nothing new. It's just been refined."

In wedding together the committee for the march on Washington, the integration movement may have started to achieve its long-sought goal of unity. If that becomes a reality, elements opposing racial integration or willing to have it on strictly limited grounds will have to re-evaluate their positions.

Arm In Arm
Marching arm in arm through the streets of Washington Wednesday were some of the most powerful Negro leaders in America—from the polished, businesslike Wilkins and Whitney Young of the National Urban League to restless James Farmer and John Lewis of the Student non-Violent Coordinating Committee and the Congress of Racial Equality.

Even before the big day in Washington was over, there was talk that the organization which brought more than 200,000 to the nation's capital would be held in tact for other projects.
