

Red China Jubilant On 14th Anniversary

HONG KONG (UPI)—Communist China today celebrated its 14th anniversary and claimed "a growing number of friends." "Since the last celebration a year ago, Peking has invaded India and broken with its Communist ally, the Soviet Union. But today the mood was friendly. Premier Chou En-lai set the tone at a reception Monday night for a record 1,800 foreign visitors in Peking for the celebrations. Referring to differences with Soviet Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev, who has been called an "imperialist lackey" in the past year in Peking propaganda attacks, Chou said "we firmly believe that the day will come when the present differences will be resolved on the basis of Marxism-Leninism."

Russia Sent Greetings
(The Soviet leadership sent formal greetings to the Chinese party and people, wishing them success in building a Communist state. But Moscow also assailed the Chinese for cutting off Soviet economic aid and making their people suffer. "It is not our fault that leaders of the Chinese people ceased their economic cooperation with the Soviet Union, thereby depriving the Chinese people of the possibility of using the unselfish aid

Bennett's Party Wins Increased Majority In British Columbia Voting

VANCOUVER, B.C. (UPI)—British Columbia's Social Credit government was in a strong bargaining position today in its bid to obtain a high price for sale of downstream Columbia River power to the United States after capturing an increased majority mandate in Monday's provincial general election. Immediately after re-election Premier W. A. C. Bennett pledged quick action to settle drawn-out disagreement between the provincial and federal governments over terms of the Columbia River Treaty which awaits Canadian ratification before work can start on the giant hydropower development.

Bennett's deputy, Attorney General Robert Bonner, said the Columbia would be the most important item for the administration to tackle after its decisive victory in an election highlighted by the province's power controversy. Bonner said the next meeting on the Columbia treaty should be held near the end of this month. The attorney general said only creation of a single U.S. power agency to bargain with Canada on the price of downstream Columbia benefits could now delay agreement. Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson, who commented in Ottawa Monday that negotiations would be completed in the near future, was expected to further comment on the talks today.

Pearson had said only "one or two" questions remained to be settled following a series of recent negotiations, one of them apparently being the price for sale of downstream benefits to the United States. The Canadian leader refused to comment further on the matter because power policy was a key issue in the B.C. election. The Columbia River Treaty was signed by the U.S. and Canadian governments Jan. 17, 1961, and was ratified by the Senate but not by the Canadian Parliament. Key issues in holding up ratification of the pact had been British Columbia's desire to sell to the United States its share of the downstream benefits created by dams provided for in the treaty, and negotiations over the price the United States would be willing to pay for the added power. Under the treaty, Canada would be entitled to one-half the additional power generated by U.S. power dams because of the operation of Canadian storage dams upstream. Canada's share would total about 1.3 million kilowatts of electricity. Former Prime Minister John G. Diefenbaker's government removed one roadblock when it agreed not to prohibit the export of Canadian power. But the price question remained. The United States has offered 3.75 mills per kilowatt hour, and British Columbia is asking 5 mills or equivalent payments to finance British Columbia dam construction. Premier Bennett has never swerved from his declaration that 5 mills would be a fair price for the United States to pay for power benefits, although he has been opposed on this point by both the U.S. and Canada's federal government. Bennett's hand was strengthened Monday when his Socialists gained four ridings from the socialistic New Democratic party while losing a cabinet minister's seat to the Socialists in the election which had been highlighted by the power controversy.
