Caught In Squeeze Of Rising Costs, U.S. Worries About Budget Problems

By DONALD JOHNSTON

UNITED NATIONS (UPI) — The United Nations, caught in the squeeze of rising costs, is worried about its growing budgetary problems.

The United States and most other members think expenses of the 111-nation organization are getting out of control and need some belt-tightening.

This problem is separate from, though obviously closely connected to the financial crisis caused by high peace-keeping costs and the refusal of some members to share them.

Speakers in the regular budget debate completed last week have complained of too many conferences, too much paper work, too much staff expense, too much guesswork in cost estimates, too little coordination of the myriad economic, social, political and legal projects.

Re-Evaluation Needed

Alluding to the rapid increase in size and complexity of the organization over the past few years, Rep. William S. Mailard, R-Calif., the U.S. spokesman here on money matters, pointed out that "the U.N. today is big business" and needs periodic re-evaluation.

The budget debate skirted the real reason for the $140 million U.N. deficit—the refusal of the Communist countries, France, South Africa, Portugal and some others to pay assessments for the expensive peace operations in the Congo and the Middle East. This is a political problem that has been put on ice until next year.

But nobody denies that the peace-keeping debt caused the alarm that has led to the first concerted movement for a closer look at the U.N. books in all fields. Peace-keeping accounts are kept separate from the regular administrative budget used for staff salaries, travel, building upkeep, printing, special missions and the like.

While there has been no trouble collecting assessments for the regular budget, widespread concern has developed because member states have just so much money for U.N. contributions—peace-keeping or otherwise.

So an economy drive is on. Thant's Dilemma

Secretary General Thant, who technically is responsible for the budget figures, is caught in a dilemma. He is under pressure from the new countries of Africa and Asia for more aid for development, but faces demands for economies because of the deficit.

The projected administrative budget for next year is approximately $100 million. This compares with $19.4 million in 1946 when there were 51 members, $60.8 million in 1959 when there were 82 members, and $93.9 million members in 1963.

The expenses will be offset by $15 million income from various sources. And while the total is far below the national budgets of most member states, delegates are concerned because the trend is steadily upward. They pointed out that peace-keeping assessments and contributions for specialized agencies such as UNICEF and UNESCO add another $400 million to the total annually.

In calling for an examination of the U.N. fiscal system, Mailard cited four basic factors which contribute to the financial difficulties, irrespective of the political peace-keeping problem:

—Inherent complexity of the organization. The U.N. is without historical precedent, and is engaged in experimentation and pioneering in a diverse range of complicated activities, some of which have no clear guidelines.

—Rapid growth. U.N. membership has doubled, and the institutional structure has expanded into 23 constituent and affiliated agencies employing about 35,000 persons and conducting operational activities in 125 countries and territories.

—Shortage of trained, available personnel to carry out complex and technical programs involving international staffs.

—A shortage of office space and facilities to meet the increasing demands for information, surveys, technical assistance.

WIND CHANGES

MIAMI (UPI)—A father and son tried to use the old Indian trick of keeping in touch by whistling during a hunting trip in the Everglades Sunday.

But the wind changed and "I couldn't hear a thing," said Corren Young. The boy was lost for six hours in the huge swamp before a Coast Guard helicopter found him at dusk.

MISSING PAINTING

AURORA, Colo. (UPI) — Police were searching today for a young woman, described as a "very beautiful" brunette wearing only a half-slip, who was last seen hanging over the bar at a nightclub in this Denver suburb.

The girl actually was an $800 painting stolen from the club.
