he will act as judge, clerk, jury, etc., on the case of his associates, thus gaining a great deal of practical experience.

Law School Studies

But in the school there must be something more than mere theory. One of the best things I know of is the moot court. Here it is that the students find the application and get the practice, and in getting the practice they are making of themselves barristers in fact and not fiction."

At this point Dean Hope, of the law school, interposed the question of whether Mr. Kerr thought the law school should require an A. B. degree before granting a law degree. To this Mr. Kerr replied that the state bar was composed largely of men without college education. And while it might be an advantage to the legal profession yet to make it prerequisite to law students to have an A. B. degree he felt it would be asking too much, for the present at least.

Senator Strayer, a legal practitioner when not playing the senatorial pawns, offered some advice to the students. "When one is studying law he is very solicitous about his future," he said. "The question is being solicitous about the right thing. Passing the bar exams makes little material difference. Be concerned with what you are going to do when you get by the exams and what you will do with a client when you get him. Were I a young man in the law school I would not be concerned with getting by the bar exams but about applying what I had learned when I did get by."

The toastmaster then called on Representative Childs, who explained House resolution No. 9, of which he is the author. "On account of the fact that there are three state schools, the University, O. A. C. and Monmouth Normal, drawing state funds, that is costing the state more than one million dollars yearly, and that so little of what these institutions were doing was known, a committee was appointed to find out."

In following Mr. Childs, President Campbell expressed himself as interested in the investigation as previously explained. "Educational institutions," said the president, "are simply the means of the people for providing what they want. When people have ideals and ambitions, and realizing that their opportunities depend upon equality in education, they are going to give themselves the amplest of opportunities."

The situation of the law school and its present status were summarized by President Campbell and high tribute paid to Dean Hope for his courage in insisting upon a two years standard. Though the present enrollment is small the optimistic statement was made that the future would take care of itself through the reputation the school would establish.

The banquet closed with a short informal discussion of various legal subjects.
