THAT QUESTION OF YELL LEADER

That rah-har-Oregon spirit is not asserting itself these days and the handful of trousers warming the bleachers as the team goes through its nightly practice are not as many as they should be.

But the fault is rooter leadership, and again the annual question of yell leader presents itself.

Alumni have for the last two years bewailed the fact that the "old Oregon" spirit was becoming a myth; that with the growth of the university and the change of dominating leaders the spirit was becoming a tradition rather than remaining a living fact. Summed up the alumni are bewailing the passing of the spirit while the present classes stand over the bier without faith for resur-

The wail of the alumni may be a needed inspiration to us of the present generation. We cannot believe the spirit has passed but from the indications this fall it is hopelessly anaemic. But that is because we rode to heavenly happiness last year on the blaze of glory in which our football heroes ended the season. And the team, almost intact, is back into harness again drilling for another strenuous season.

The fault is we are self-satisfied and have not chosen a yell leader. No man puts in quite so strenuous work as does the yell leader during the football season. And choosing the leader now is handicapping him for more than the length of time school has been open.

THE COLLEGE IGNORAMUS.

The Portland Oregonian arises the question of a college ignoramus in an editorial of August 27, and like so many others of the same mind falls, into error. Thankfully enough it abhors rote learning and condemns it for its own worth. The scholar with his head full of facts of no value has assimilated a lot of stuff that will be of no practical use to him.

The Oregonian assumes that a man goes to college where he is held in leash for four years or more while his head is pumped full of so much hot air. Then he is released from the institution by graduation—or otherwise—he is like a balloon—up in the air—and must suffer the arverse knocks of a cruel world before he comes to earth again and starts to make a business man of himself from the ground floor up. Such an assumption is reprehensible.

The days of gone by years are no more the same today in the editorial field as in the commercial or inventive fields. Educational progress is marked by more efficient tactics and methods. And to attach a stigma to the man with a diploma is to censure education as doled out in our colleges and universities today.

A great change has taken place today in the methods and tactics of bygone years. This change is due to the democratization of higher education. But the Oregonian has not kept up with the times and superficially expounds on the minority representation of our colleges. The minority representation is composed of the poor folks who come to the university while away a few more years, and somehow hope for miracles to pass. More interested in good times than ambitious work they shift the burdens of studying to their classmates, and skin through on Confucius' one corner. Then when they come out with a diploma and a head of hot air they are wiseacres and either seek those jobs held only by men of age and many years experience, or smoke cigarettes and entertain "milady" while dad foots the bill. These are the ones who advertise their college education and on whom the Oregonian and the like hop and draw their superficial conclusions. This is the stigma given a university or college education.

But how about the real facts-this democratization of higher education? The democratization that is transforming higher education? The answer is-look at the hands of the majority. They are hands that know what work is. They are hands trained in toil. That is the democratization of higher education. It is education not alone for the wealthy and idle but education for those with ambitions and visions. It is education those who have creative faculties and wish to increase their efficiency. They are hands that have supported themselves, dominated by minds that have guided their energies.

It would have been better had the Oregonian stigmatized the breed as represented in the minority representation and not the class as represented in the general term "college student."

The alumni are going to feel the pinch of the high cost of living as they have not before. For the increased cost of printing is cutting them out of two issues of the Emerald a week. In past years the three issues of the week were mailed to all "good" alumni with a special alumni edition each week. But now only one issue a week goes to "good," (alumni.) Heaven comes higher!

That University of Oregon graduate who manufactured salve for the growing of lower digital extremities got one patient that will be of no practical use to m.

The Oregonian assumes that a man pess to college where he is held in leash or foot the bill.

It was callous wit that responded when asked "Are you out for football?" "Yes,
I am out."—with a sarcastic tinge to

OREGON TRIO FORMED

Middleton Concert Company Will Go Over State.

Well Known Soloists Will Represent University of Oregon in Concert Work.

Martin Tinker.

A new trio has been formed with the opening of this school year in the music department, which will represent the University of Oregon in concert work all over the state. This trio, which will be known as the Middleton Concert company, is composed of Mrs. Middleton, vocolist; Mr. Badollet, flutist; and Miss Davis, piano soloist and accompaniest. All of these musicians have been heard in concert work in Eugene and alway with great success. Mrs. Middleton states that most of the work will be ensemble work although there will be a few solos.

Mrs. Middleton possesses a contralto voice of very rich quality and with the high flute will be a very pleasing combination. Miss Davis' ability as an accompaniest is indisputable as for many years she has accompanied the vesper choir and prominent soloists of Eugene and the University.

Dr. Landsbury of the University school of music will go to Portland every two weeks this winter in the interest of the extension department, giving lectures on the different phases of music.

ANNOUNCEMENTS
