

GRADUATE CLUB FORMED BY B. A. STUDENTS AT BANQUET AT OSBUN

42 Advanced Students Gather With Faculty at Their First Assembly

More than one hundred bachelors of arts are now enrolled as students in the University of Oregon, according to an announcement made by President P. L. Campbell Friday night at the first general assembly ever held by the Graduate School. Forty-two sat down at table at the Hotel Osburn as guests of Dean Young, and at the close of the banquet, after the faculty had left the room, the post graduates present held a meeting and appointed an organization committee to draw up a constitution for the Graduate Club, which will become one of the most influential student organizations on the campus.

Heralded as the most important milestone of progress passed in years by the speakers at the banquet to mark the emergence of the Graduate School from its period of nonage and its establishment as the means of setting Oregon education on its feet as an independent system, freeing it from suspicion of parasitism upon eastern institutions and substituting a status of competitive and equal give and take.

Graduate School Growing
For many years the University of Oregon has done faithful work in building up a Graduate School. Some years it has had less than a dozen students; some years the work went on actually without funds; and up to this year the Graduate Council, intent upon upholding the University's reputation for quality and avoiding pretentious claims, has refused to consider granting any degree higher than that of Master of Arts.

At the assembly Friday night, however, it was announced that the Graduate Council would hereafter entertain candidates for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy, the highest academic degree granted for research and scholarship along regular channels. Dean H. D. Sheldon, for years the most conservative member of the council, announced that he was at last convinced that the Graduate School was now established with equipment, faculty and resources adequate to insure the respectful recognition abroad of the highest degrees backed by the reputation of the University of Oregon Graduate School.

University Mark of Distinction
The existence of a Graduate School is held, in academic parlance, to be the distinguishing mark that entitles an institution to the name "university". Seats of higher learning without a graduate school are properly designated "college" or "institute". Within every university are various "colleges" and "schools", which are filled with "undergraduate" students. A "university" is held to differ from any other type of institution in that it is self-perpetuating; is not dependent upon any other institution for its teachers, or its inspiration. This is held by educational philosophers to be the most important fact about a university.

For instance, these philosophers hold that if Oregon were surrounded by an impassable wall that shut off all communication with the outside, the existence of a good Graduate School would be the most important single fact in maintaining and advancing its civilization. Without such a wall Oregon is liable to draw upon the generosity of other states.

Training for Teachers
In the other colleges of the university as in all high schools and lower institutions, it is always possible to secure teachers by appealing to the institution next higher. The rural school gets teachers from the high school or normal school; the high school takes the graduates of under-graduate colleges. The problem only becomes difficult at the top; who shall train the teachers for the highest schools of all? That is why graduate work is so different in character from any other kind of teaching.

Everywhere except in the graduate school, the student absorbs the learning already possessed by his instructors and written down in books in the libraries. But in the nature of the case, the graduate student, who plans to become himself a teacher in the highest schools, cannot merely be content to partake of the learning of his instructor, whose equal or superior he hopes to become, and as for the future of the libraries, this student himself expects to be the author of new and authoritative works, treating subjects never adequately handled before.

What Ph. D. Means
And this is exactly what the degree of Doctor of Philosophy implied. The examining board refused this degree to any student who cannot prove conclusively that in some respects he knows more about his limited subject than any other man,

FRIENDLY ANNEX RISING

Occupants of Hall to Have Their Own Dining Room Soon

The construction of the annex on the east side of Friendly hall is expected to be completed about November 1, according to Mrs. E. P. Dutton, matron of the hall. The partition on the University street side will be taken out and the dining room extended.

The completion of this dining room will accommodate all students who live in private houses but are forced to eat their meals outside of their residences. At the present time between 280 and 300 students are fed each meal, and both dining rooms have been turned into cafeterias. The completion of the new dining room will enable the men of Friendly hall to have their own dining room back again.

The new extension will cost about $1500. In addition a small bakeshop will be added to the hall kitchen.
