Hats Off!

With the organization of a new honor society every few weeks, the Women's Emerald recommends the organization of an embryo group to be called the Oregon Hat Tippers for reason that the men who doff their hats to college women are so exclusive and in such minority that they might derive pleasure from intimate association.

Many and varied have been the complaints which have been printed concerning the neglectful part women have played in keeping up the "Hello" tradition of Oregon. But how many women have started the year courageously hailing every man who bore the least semblance to a college student, and have received in return perhaps a gruff hello, but seldom the respectful doffing of the hat.

One method of hat tipping so prevalent these days may be analyzed as a mere salute, plainly a relic of war days. How much a man misses in self-expression when he allows himself to adopt a careless habit!

Women have not been as gracious in accepting the common courtesies of men in the past as they might have been, and if it meant the dropping of some of the more thoughtful politeness the blame might not fall upon the man. Bobbed hair, women's suffrage, co-education, all these have tended to place woman on a more equal footing with man, and perhaps have made him careless of the courtesies without which life would be barbaric and unlivable.

An Educational Renaissance

"Signs are not wanting," writes H. C. Morrison of the University of Chicago, "that the field of higher education is beginning to be stirred by concern for the intellectual interests of students."

The criticism has been made from time to time, by the critics of cultural education, that the college of liberal arts fails to justify its existence in that it fails to develop students who are devoted to the scholarly life.

Stimulating premiums on scholastic achievement are offered to the students in various novel forms which man be cited as another sign of real intellectual interest among the students.

"The American people are reading enormously even if they are not reading the classics. They are reading the occupational books and fiction, social science and history; they are reading the newspapers and magazines in carload lots.

Theta Sigma Phi, national honorary society for women in journalism, extends its most cordial greetings to you high school visitors on the campus this week-end.

With E. J. H. at a University Orchestra Concert

It was a hullabaloo of a splash in which robust base drums vied with husky cellos when the University orchestra dove into the turbulent waters of sound vibrations last night in Villard hall.

Maybe this is not according to Jack Dempsey or Dante. But isn't there such a thing as expressing one's self?

In striking contrast came the second number, "Nick Carter's Moonbeams," a complacent thing, almost priggish in spots, yet nevertheless spirited.

To prove this review is authentic, that the reviewer was present to the near-end of the concert, and that he did not simply rely on his imagination, we cite this incident of the thirteenth inning of basses and trombones when President Campbell arose and walked out in his sleep.

Those who have no ear for music are usually those who have used that member of their anatomy for a pen rack.

Harry Smith was seen on the campus yesterday noon sitting in the shade of the palm of his hand.
