

ENROLLMENT IS BELIEVED LARGE

Today what appears to be the largest student body ever assembled on the University of Oregon campus will settle down to regular class work.

With two days yet remaining in which students may file cards at the Registrar's office, reports from the various schools and departments indicate that practically all of them have enrolled a larger number of students than were taking work in the same divisions of the University last fall.

The Registrar's office would give no figures regarding the number of students enrolled during the two days of registration already gone by, but the heads of the various departments and deans of the schools in many cases were confidently predicting increases of enrollment in their classes of from ten to thirty per cent before the close of the day's registration yesterday.

The school of journalism had enrolled 188 students last night and many of the old students who are already on the campus or who are known to be planning on returning during the present week are not included in this number. During the fall term of last year 142 students were enrolled in this school.

Dean Sheldon of the school of education felt confident that the final registration would show an increase of at least twenty per cent in education majors.

Enrollment in the school of architecture and allied arts is larger than it was last fall according to an estimate by Dean Lawrence.
