

NEED OF CLUBHOUSE FOR FACULTY IS EXPRESSED

Kincaid Site Proposed for Building of Moderate Cost; Expense Would Be Small with 200 Members

A faculty clubhouse as a home for bachelor professors and as social headquarters for the faculty has been a long felt need on the Oregon campus. The formation of the Oregonia, a social club composed entirely of faculty members, is a definite and tentative step in that direction, states Frederick S. Dunn, professor of Latin, in the University. Much enthusiasm has been inspired among the faculty in discussing this problem.

A building of moderate cost as near the campus as possible would be most desirable. There are sites available on the Kincaid property and on 11th avenue which would be most convenient. This building would have to be put up entirely at the expense of the faculty. But as there are practically 200 members and individual expense would be small in comparison to the conveniences and comforts that would be secured.

At present the faculty have no room to call their own for any entertaining or social event they may desire. The library is not provided with any adequate study rooms which the faculty should have. When world famous men or distinguished and talented celebrities make a brief visit to the campus many of the faculty members are unable to meet them or enjoy their visits because there is no selected headquarters for their entertainment. Carl Sandberg's midnight party at the Anchorage is a case in point. The delightful hours sped away in an informal intimacy with one of the great poets of the century. It was a treat those present will treasure as a privilege perhaps never to be experienced again. Those of the faculty who missed it cannot help but regret.

"Such a building," says Professor Walter C. Barnes, "would necessarily contain a lounging room, a dining room big enough for all the faculty, and a small library."

Discussing the problem further Professor Barnes believes that the present social feeling among the faculty is so harmonious and enjoyable that a faculty club house is not needed to promote it.

"I have never," Professor Barnes said, "been anywhere in my experience where a faculty was more sociable, had more good will and worked more harmoniously than the faculty of the University of Oregon."

The University of Washington has a faculty clubhouse as well as the University of California, the latter also having a faculty tennis court attached, where match games between the faculty and students take place.

Oregon Woman Novelist to Speak at Conference

President of Writers' League Has Done Varied Journalistic Work

Perhaps no woman writer in Oregon has done a wider variety of work than Anne Shannon Monroe, president of the Oregon Writers' League, who is to speak at the writers' section of the annual newspaper conference this year. Miss Monroe admits doing everything but poetry.

Her first novel, Eugene Norton, was published when she was no older than the average Oregon co-ed, and her fourth book is now in preparation. She has done humor on the Chicago News, editorials on the Chicago Tribune, over 200 syndicated short stories for newspapers, money-making problems of untrained women in the Delineator, three separate business fiction serials for the Saturday Evening Post, "portrait" work for Good Housekeeping and editorials for the Ladies' Home Journal. She covered the whole United States at one time getting acquainted with and writing up women judges of the country.

Miss Monroe lives in a little house in Southeast Portland which she built in 1906, after doing the Lewis and Clark Exposition for The World Today, and there on an ordinary Corona typewriter she is working steadily on Helie of the Double O, a novel of ranch life in south-central Oregon.

A. C. Dixon, former University regent and Mrs. Dixon left this week for New Orleans, where Mr. Dixon will attend a lumbermen's conference.

the man. The Oxford idea is that the man trained after the Oxford plan will very speedily get his tools in after life and will always use them wisely thereafter. The American idea is that a man in getting the tools will somehow or other acquire the ability to use them wisely.

"I think," said the dean, "that Mr. Morley's idea is susceptible of engrafting on the American plan up to a certain point. I don't think that the pure Oxford idea would succeed in America—don't think it even feasible to attempt it. As is so often the case the truth for America lies between."
