THE THURSDAY ASSEMBLES

Editor of the Emerald: Most of us go to the Thursday morning assemblies for what good we may get out of them. There seems to be quite a few, however, who go there for some other purpose—what that purpose is is a puzzle.

It is difficult enough under the best conditions to hear the speaker when one is sitting toward the rear of the hall. But when certain groups are continually whispering, laughing or being seized with an epidemic of coughs it becomes impossible.

If these parties will not of themselves show consideration for others might it not be a good idea to appoint someone, probably an Oregon Knight, to act as a sort of sergeant-at-arms, to quietly ask the offending ones to desist.

I am sure that attendance at assemblies would be larger if everybody could be assured of a chance to hear the speaker.

the author of the Oregon article. Gossip of the classes and of medical school alumni run throughout the magazine. The marriage of Grace Edgington and Leonard Jordan is included in the doings of alumni. Oregon poetry, edited by Margaret Skavlan and sports by Web Jones complete the departmental work.

The magazine contains many pictures of scenes in and around the medical school and the campus at Eugene. The medical school faculty have a page devoted to their pictures and there are also pictures of C. S. Jackson, Walter E. Nichol, whose scholarship for the fall term was highest at the Portland branch, Clinton Howard, the Rhodes scholar, Dr. Ira Manville, clinic work, and the new football coach in Eugene.

Jeannette Calkins has edited "Old Oregon" since last fall and before that was managing editor. Her assistants are Inez King and Margaret Morrison. Miss Morrison recently resigned from the Morning Register to take up her new duties.

OREGON'S BASKETBALL VICTORIES FOUND TO BE OF RECENT DATE

Sports Writer Unearths Statistics That Reveal Mistaken Idea of Varsity's Prowess

The 1921 basketball team by almost copping the Pacific Coast conference championship put the name Oregon in basketball annals all over the coast.

With such men as "Eddie" Durno, "Billy" Reinhart, Nish Chapman, Mark Latham, "Hunk" Latham, and "Frans" Beller to pick from, George Bohler, at that time coach, had something most unusual to start with.

In the middle of a successful season they played the University of California in the Army for what might be called the Coast championship. California won both games but not until they had gone through a terrible struggle. The first game California won by three points, 26-23, the second by six points, 24-18.

The following year things went bad again. Coupled with a lot of hard luck only two men from the previous year returned. "Eddie" Durno coached the frosh team, Nish Chapman did not return and "Hunk" Latham and Hal Chapman were in Hawaii with the football team. This left only Mark Latham and Frans Beller to build the team around.

The varsity lost about everything including games to Willamette and Whitman. However they partially redeemed themselves by winning two straight games from Nevada. Incidentally these are the only two games ever played by Oregon and Nevada basketball teams.

The 1923 team certainly looked good, and were exceptionally good—at times. Inconsistency marked their play the whole year.

They started out the season with a bang, simply swamped everything that came along until that heart-breaking defeat by Washington occurred. That game broke something, spirit is probably the best name for it. Anyway, their game of ball couldn't be compared with the game they had been playing. Maybe at some time during a game they would break loose with a type of play which was up to their old standard, but it never at any time stayed long. Consequently Oregon did not get very high in the 1923 standing.

Nothing more than a championship team started training in 1924. Latham, Chapman, Shafer, Gowans, Hobson—they all were stars. "Billy" Reinhart was all smiles.

But after defeating Washington, Chapman's knee went bad and Shafer was operated on for appendicitis. Oregon was in another rut. Her subs were good, yes, but they hadn't had enough experience to make them the perfect players Chapman and Shafer were. Oregon's defeat of Washington by only one point was proof enough that she needed all the strength she could possibly get.

The loss proved too much and Washington won the second game with comparative ease. Washington also won the Northwest championship and played California for the Pacific Coast championship, which California won.

With all this, Oregon beat the Aggies in two of the four games played. Not so bad after all.

WESTWARD, HO!

Sectionalism in the United States was never more prevalent in history than it is today in educational circles. There are many educators, men of letters and public officials, who refuse to recognize the equality of the west's universities with those of the east. Sometimes it seems they have become biased by mere tradition and clique spirit.

We of the west ask—after college what? There is the proof of the pudding. We let Henry L. Doherty, famous public utilities owner and executive, act as our mouthpiece. In speaking of his experience in selecting executives for his many enterprises, Mr. Doherty says: "I don't know why it is, but we always have better luck with our western men. Once in a while an eastern graduate makes good. But not so often. Approximately 90 per cent of my most successful executives are products of the middle west or west."

THEIR LATIN STUDIES HELP THEM

The American Classical League and the Bureau of Education, after studying the records of 10,000 candidates for admission to college, find that the Latin surpassed the non-Latin students by some 13 per cent in other subjects than Greek and Latin. So Lord Redesdale found that long grubbing in Greek and Latin grammar at Eaton helped him in the study of Chinese and other strange tongues.

One of the greatest instances of the value of classical studies was the invitation some 18 years ago of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology to Andrew Fleming West, the Princeton protagonist of the classics, to become its head. That is striking testimony to the appreciation of the worth of classical culture in a high and difficult field, seemingly most remote from it.

It may be said that Wests are likely to be as common as hen's teeth; but this 13 per cent superiority is something and indicates a good deal. And the Bureau of Education tells us that the Latin courses in the high school now attract more students than all other language courses combined; and that, in the secondary schools, some 22,500 Latin teachers are instructing 940,000 students.

Dean Seashore's Plan Discussed By Faculty Association at Meeting

ing the past year. Dr. Warner's suggestion was upheld by Dean E. W. Allen, of the school of journalism, who presented a tentative credit scheme which might be employed under this theory. He proposed that honors students should receive 10 credits, II students 9 credits, III students 8, and so on down to the V student who should receive only five credits. According to this system 1,300 credits would graduate a student. Prior to the opening of the discussion an election of officers was held for the coming term. Dr. James Gilbert of the economic department was elected president of the association for the coming term, and Dr. Milne of the mathematics department was chosen secretary.
